The glad wire tingled with the message to the father. The minister, with the overjoyed mother, retired to wait for the time when the bandaged eyes could bear light enough for the first look at the beautiful world.

At last came the notification of the expected test. In the dimly-lighted room the mother and the minister stood breathless, while the doctor carefully raised the shade. The little lad, overwhelmed by the sudden possession of a new sense, cast a bewildered look from one to another of the three.

"Johnnie," said the minister, "this is your mother." The little arms went up and clasped her neck, the happy boy verifying this new sense by those already tested. Caressing the loving face he saw leaning above him, he cried, "O mother! Is this really you, or is it heaven?"

"I felt," said the minister, "as if I witnessed something of the glad bewilderment of a newly translated soul in its first sight of the face of our heavenly Father."—Ex.

Suggestive Saloon Signs.

"High-Grade Liquors"—for low-grade men on the down-grade of life.

"Majestic Rye"—will ensure a majestic gait to the consumer, and a majestic dwelling for the dealer.

"Pride" Whiskey—goeth before destruction.

"Pale Beers"—warranted to make the wife pale with anxiety and suffering, and the children pale for lack of food and clothing.

"El Dorado Wines"—make a fool's El Dorado for their victims, giving a moment's exhilaration in exchange for a lasting weakness.

"Happy Days Rye"—after drinking it, no more happy days for you.

"Reliable Family Liquors"—may be relied upon to break up the family, separate husband and wife, driving boys from home as soon as they can walk, and sending girls into the mill instead of to school.

"Old Glory Saloon." We will lose our country's battles for her, run her ships aground, corrupt her officials, and ruin her boys. May "Old Glory" long protect us in our war against her.

"Importers and Rectifiers." Importers of foreign stupidity, brutality, lust, and murderousness. Rectifiers of what? Surely not of the home or society or the nation. Ah, it must be a misspelling of Wreckifiers, Makers of Wrecks; wrecks of manhood, with tottering limbs and silly brains; wrecks of womanhood, with all beauty and refinement gone; wrecks of childhood, even before their launching.

"That's All"—and full enough. It only represents waste, want, ignorance, degeneration, and death. That's all.—H. A. Fellows in Christian Endeavor World.

"Keeps" for the Children.

These "keep texts" are all in the Bible. Find them and learn them, and so make them yours:

"Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life."

"Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile."

"Keep thee far from a false matter."

"He that keepeth his mouth keepeth his life."

"Take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently."

"Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

"My son, keep thy Father's commandments."

"My son, keep sound wisdom and discretion."—Church Intelligencer.

My Mother's Faith.

The fire upon the hearth is low,
And there is stillness everywhere.
Like troubled spirits here and there,
The firelight shadows fluttering go;
And as the shadows 'round me creep,
A childish treble breaks the gloom,
And softly from a farther room
Comes, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

And somehow, with that little prayer
And that sweet treble in my ears,
My thoughts go back to distant years
And linger with a dear one there;
And, as I hear the child's amen,
My mother's faith comes back to me;
Crouched at her side I seem to be,
And mother holds my hands again.

O for an hour in that dear place!
O for the peace of that dear time!
O for that childish trust sublime!
O for a glimpse of mother's face!
Yet as the shadows 'round me creep,
I do not seem to be alone—
Sweet music of that treble tone—
And "Now I lay me down to sleep."
—Eugene Field.

Boys, Please Don't—

Show the surly side of your disposition when at home.

Take advantage of the generous impulses of your mother.

Say things which make father wish you would take a back seat.

Think it appears smart to become excessively taciturn when at home.

Talk back to your father with the thought that it is smart.

Expect your mother and sisters to give you as much attention as though you were a child.

Fail to extend your family a pleasant greeting on going home.

Think it unmanly to once in a while bestow a caress on your mother.

Make your family smile at your vain-glorious boastings.

Do things which will necessitate a humiliating explanation. — Philadelphia Bulletin.

The Heart's Desire.

A beautiful story is told of Rudyard Kipling during a serious illness a few years since. The trained nurse was sitting at his bedside on one of the anxious nights when the sick man's condition was most critical. She was watching him intently and noticed that his lips began to move. She bent over him, thinking he wished to say something to her. She heard him whisper very softly the words of the old familiar prayer of childhood, "Now I lay me down to sleep." The nurse, realizing that her patient did not require her services, and that he was praying, said in apology for having intruded upon him, "I beg your pardon, Mr. Kipling; I thought you wanted something." "I do," faintly replied the sick man; "I want my heavenly father. He only can care for me now."

In his great weakness there was nothing that human help could do, and he turned to God and crept into his bosom, seeking the blessing and the care which none but God can give. That is what we need to do in every time of danger, of trial, of sorrow—when the gentlest human love can do nothing—creep into our heavenly father's bosom, saying, "Now I lay me down to sleep." That is the way to peace. Earth has no shelter in which it can be found, but in God the feeblest may find it.—J. R. Miller.

Don't Worry.

Don't start nervously if a child makes a noise or breaks a dish—keep your worry for broken bones.

Don't sigh too often over servants' short-comings.

Don't get excited if the servant has neglected to dust the legs of the hall table; neither the welfare of your family nor the nation is involved.

Don't exhaust all your reserve force over petty cares. Each time that a woman loses control over herself, her nerves, her temper, she loses just a little nervous force, just a little physical well being, and moves a fraction of an inch farther on in the path that leads to premature old age.

Don't go to bed late at night and rise at daybreak and imagine that every hour taken from sleep is an hour gained.

Don't eat as if you only had a minute in which to finish the meal.

Don't give unnecessary time to a certain established routine of housekeeping, when it could be much more profitably spent in rest or recreation.

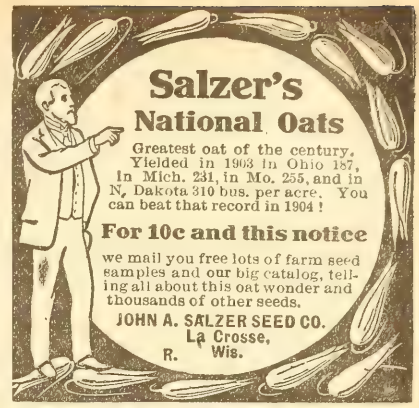

Don't always be doing something; have intermittent attacks of idling. To understand how to relax, is to understand how to strengthen nerves.

Don't fret and don't worry are the most healthful of maxims.—Selected.

Pay the Freight.

A New York lawyer tells the following story of a darkey preacher in North Carolina, who prefaced the passing of the collection plate with "Salvation's free, brethren, salvation's free! It don't cost nothin'! But we have to pay the freight on it. We will now pass aroun' the hat, an' collect the freight charges."

An English paper reports the discovery of a real Mrs. Partington. She walked into the office of the judge of probate, and inquired, "Are you the judge of reprobates?" "I am the judge of probate," was the reply. "Well, that's it, I expect," quoth the lady. "You see, my husband died detested, and left me several little infidels, and I want to be appointed their executioner!"

Why He Didn't Pay.

A Missouri preacher, at the conclusion of one of his sermons, said: "Let all in the house who are paying their debts stand up." Instantly every man, woman and child, with one exception, rose to their feet. The preacher seated them and said: "Now, every man not paying his debts stand up." The exception noted, a careworn, hungry-looking individual, clothed in his last summer's suit, slowly assumed a perpendicular position. "How is it, my friend," asked the minister, "that you are the only man not to meet his obligations?"

"I run a newspaper," he meekly answered, "and the brethren here who just stood up are my subscribers, and —."—Selected.

A Limit to All Things.

He had been away on a long journey, and upon his return his wife was detailing to him a number of reforms and improvements which she had successfully engineered during his absence.

"And you know," she said, "that closet that was locked for over a month, and which you said couldn't be opened except by a locksmith? Well"—triumphantly—"I opened it."

"Well, well, how in the world did you do it?"

"With a hairpin."

"And the furnace door," she continued, "has been slopping around on one hinge just because you were too lazy to fix it, but it's all right now."

"Well, I'm glad you had it fixed."

"Had it fixed! I fixed it myself—with a hairpin."

"And then there's that crayon portrait of mother that stood in the corner for almost six solid weeks because you never would bring me any picture-hooks—"

"Well, I intended to, but—"

"Oh, 'but!' Well, it don't make any difference now; I got it up with a hook I made myself—out of a hairpin."

"And there's Willie; you've been coaxing him for a year, trying to break him of biting his nails, and I broke him in a week."

"With a hairpin?" he inquired weakly.

"No!" she snapped, "don't be a goose! With a hair-brush!"—Lippincott.

Uncle Sam's Bank.

"Let's get up early and pick all the pond lilies," said Everett.

"Yes," said Richard, "and get ahead of Uncle Sam."

"But he sells them; and all we do is to put them in a bowl of water and forget everything about them," objected Anna.

"I don't care. They're no more his than ours," said Richard. "Our cottage is on this pond just as much as his old shanty."

So the next morning the trio were up earlier than usual, and left their mother only beginning to get breakfast, while they went out in a row-boat.

"There he is already," exclaimed Everett.

Sure enough, in an old, flat-bottomed boat, a colored man was making his way toward the patch of lily pads.

"We'll steal in on him quietly," whispered Richard, and they followed close to the shore.

Now he was leaning far over to pull in the white flowers. "Good ketch dis mawnin'," they heard him say. "Heah dar, ma beauty, come in heah; fo' yo' gwine help sen' Unc' Sam's boy to de school, you are. Got ter hab clo'es, he has; an' you got ter help furnish 'em. Seems like dis pon' was Unc' Sam's bank, whare de Lawd put sabins in fo' him ter jest come 'long an' draw out. So don' min' bein' picked, ma beauties; fo' you an' de fishes what swin round below dar, you all help sen' Unc' Sam's boy to de school."

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums
Told by Geo. H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable!

I grew despondent; my deafness tormented me. Daily I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor, and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a cured, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any other such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any cause.

With my device I can cure deafness in any person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. My invention not only cures, but at once stops the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest aural surgeons in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I'll want to place my 190-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands. I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, many whose names you know, and I am sure that all this will convince you that the cure of deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book today and address my firm—The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1509 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

On the triple doorways of a great cathedral in Milan, Italy, there are three inscriptions spanning the archway.

Over one is carved a beautiful wreath of roses, and underneath are the words: "All that which pleases is but for a moment."

Over another is sculptured a cross, upon which we read: "All that which troubles is but for a moment."

But underneath the great central entrance of the main isle is the inscription: "That only is important which is eternal."—Christian Leader.

A little girl of our acquaintance has a particular fondness for Bible stories. On one occasion she was being told the story of Jonah and the whale. When the climax of the tale was reached, and Jonah had been thrown upon the shore, the little maiden was asked, "And what do you think Jonah did then?" To which the ready response came, "I dess he goed home and changed his fins."—Church Union.

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

The Christian Church Record, published by O. M. Pennock, Chetopa, Kans., had, in the January number a good notice of our Advance Society, for which we are grateful. It's fine to have people talk about us, when they say good things. Let's resolve not to talk about people, except in that way. I have had five families to apply for Little Joe, wanting to adopt him into good homes. It's good to find so much kindness in the world. We want a home for our orphan, but the Orphans' Home doesn't give any money to the family who takes one. So whoever gets Little Joe must take him for love. Our money supports him now in the Home, but if he is taken away, we will immediately adopt another orphan somewhere. I understand he can't be legally given to any family until next August, but perhaps this is a mistake. In the meantime, I ask those who have applied for him to wait patiently till the Orphans' Home board decides the question. I sent them $5 last month, and I am sending $5 now; so there goes $10 of our $50. If you are taking The Philanthropist (913 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, 25 cents a year) you read how the orphans passed Christmas, and you saw that Little Joe got our present. Didn't they have a fine time? And a continued story began in The Philanthropist. It's good, and I didn't write it either. Next week we'll have more "Green Witch."

The matron of the Orphans' Home, Miss Williamson, writes: "Joe received his letter, and understands as a little boy would, about his many friends (the Av. S.). Through the kindness of the society he was the happy owner, also, of a toy—a rolling bell—and a money bank. The bell is destroyed, of course, but the little bank sits on the nursery sideboard. He was a very happy little boy Christmas, and his bright eyes sparkled with fun. He has gone to stay three days with a little boy who has learned to love Joe like an own brother. Joe loves Clifford, also. Clifford started to the Home with his precious pair of bantams to give the children, but on the way he decided he would rather they would be just for Joe. Clifford's mamma was surprised, but she knows how Little Joe has crept into the heart of her own reticent boy. Joe went on his visit so sweet and clean and rosy, it would have pleased all the Av. S. to have seen him. . . (Later:) Joe came home yesterday after a nice visit with Clifford, and is now up in the nursery playing with the other children. Like the others, he received his Christmas in a basket, Christmas morning. When the rising bell rang, each jumped out and hunted his basket under the bed; then shouts of gladness filled the house. . . Yesterday, I took 90 to the Zoo. Joe went and saw things wonderful to the small man. After such a happy afternoon I got home to find a boy with pneumonia failing very fast. He died last night. He was 11. His death was very sudden. This is such a busy life with its changes in one day from gladness to sadness, and this morning the matron of this Orphans' Home is, oh, so tired! Pray that God may uphold my hands, strengthen my heart, and continue my health and strength until my work is done." (Will not each member of the Advance Society say a little prayer for her? We know our prayers are answered. We prayed that $50 might be raised for our orphan, and $70.53 is the result so far. This shows how God answers prayers even in dollars and cents, when the prayer is in His cause.)

May Speece, Bucklin, Mo.: "I have just heard some very good news. Josie Lineberry called me up to say I have won 'Adnah' for the four best Av. S. reports. Our mail box is a quarter of a mile from the house, but Mr. Lineberry's is right in front of his door, so they get their CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST first. I have been sick a long time. I have been gripped rather firmly; but the news that I have won 'Adnah' has done almost as much for me as quinine pills. I wonder what Josie has told on me now? She said she proved in her letter that I was a coward. Now, whatever else I am, I am not that! Everybody knows a school teacher can't be a coward. Oh, I do hate to stay indoors these pretty days! I know my skates are getting rusty. So the money for Little Joe is raised and I didn't have a hand in the pie." But it wasn't my fault. I was sending some money when I got sick and my letter wasn't mailed. But I suppose we'll want $50 for him next year." (Indeed we will, or for some other orphan equally needy, and I am glad the little pieces keep coming in. I hope the stream won't dry up, but run all year. It wouldn't hurt us if we had $100 and two orphans, would it? By the way, three more Plattsburg girls, withholding their names, give a quarter a piece, and a Plattsburg boy gives 50 cents. That makes $8.05 raised right here at home, and I didn't ask for a cent of it; not one cent! And yet, everybody knows me here! I think it's wonderful. And my Kentucky cousins gave $2, and my Kansas City aunt 50 cents. I don't mean my rich cousins, either!)

Josie Lineberry, St. Catherine, Mo.: "Perhaps my last letter was lost, as it wasn't printed." (Did it tell about riding in the Ferris wheel? That one was printed; if not, it must have been lost.) "I don't want Sidney Chastain to judge me by himself and think me too lazy to keep the rules, so I write again. Like Nannie D. Chambers, I forgot my Bible verse after keeping seven weeks on the next quarter. I can't tell how bad I felt! May Speece said she would have cried, so you see she isn't much braver than I, if she did run away and ride on the Ferris wheel." (I remember now, it was May who wrote that account.) "I began again the next day.

I didn't lose anything, only delayed my report, which I now inclose with 50 cents for Little Joe. When I see the praise given us from so many states, and even England, I feel so proud to be a member of the Av. S. I wish I could send more. Nothing could compensate for the loss of my parents; it must be so with Little Joe; but by loving kindness and cheerful giving, we can make his life brighter and happier."

Lois Percy, Thomas, Okla.: "The money mamma and I sent for Little Joe was so little we were almost ashamed of it, but it was all we could spare: I must go and feed and water my bird." (When you send what you can spare, if it's only a penny, I want you to feel that you are doing as much for Little Joe as if you were a millionaire sending $1000. And indeed, you will be sending a penny more than any millionaire has sent so far!) Jessie Underwood, Boyd, Ore., forgot her history the fourth week, but began again. She says, "I hope you will hurry up and get that new coat with nine fur tails. We have no snow, but I think there will be before you could get here." (Sounds like she's trying to scare me away, doesn't it?) Eva Hawkins, Ozark, Ark., says she is glad to think she has a part in our Av. S. orphan work. Mrs. Emma Kelso, postmistress of Putnam, Ill., sends 50 cents. The Mantion, Cal., branch society sends five new names: Cornelia, Ethel and Eva Pritchard, and Ella and Claude Randall. Hurray! Mary Rice, of Harrisonville, Mo., who sent 25 cents for Joe, says, "This afternoon mamma was telling my two little brothers about Little Joe. They became interested and emptied the pennies from their banks. They with mother and father send 60 cents. I wish all a happy new year." Grace Read, Christiana, Ont., brings Canada into line for Little Joe with 25 cents. Kind greetings come to us from La Mision Christiana, Monterrey, Mexico. Flossie Davis, Des Moines, Ia., remembered us with a Christmas card. Great stack of letters—Honor List, etc., before me—must go over till another time. But don't stop writing; don't be uneasy about the money you sent. If you sent it, I received it.

MY SYMPHONY

By Thomas Curtis Clark

To bear the burdens that befall my life,
    With courage strong;
To greet the woes with which my lot is rife,
    With gladsome song;
To thwart temptation's power to wreck my soul,
    With purpose true;
To see, beyond the clouds that o'er my vision roll,
    Bright heaven's blue.

To see in every flower and tree that grows,
    A God of love;
To hear in every breeze that gently blows,
    Notes from above;
To feel for every human heart that beats,
    A brother's care;
To know whatever lot the hand of fortune metes,
    My Lord doth share.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events

The second week of the war has not been marked by any such striking events as the first. The first thing to be done, according to the Japanese plan of campaign, was to get control of the sea, and that Japan has apparently done with all necessary completeness by the remarkably prompt and brilliant movements at Port Arthur and Chemulpo last week. The next and far greater thing to be done is to get similar control of the situation on land, and that will be a matter not of days, but of weeks and months. All dispatches reporting the movement of troops are necessarily rigidly censored, and it is impossible to do more than guess at the time and place where the land forces of Japan and Russia will first come together in considerable numbers. An unconfirmed report says that the clash has already occurred, and that Russia has lost 2,500 men. Other reports tell of small Japanese losses in skirmishes along the Yalu River. The Russian military headquarters have been transferred from Port Arthur to Harbin. With the Russian squadron at Port Arthur partly destroyed and the harbor completely blockaded, and communication with home depending entirely upon a long line of railroad which is difficult to protect, the situation of Port Arthur was far too dangerous for a base of supplies. Harbin, several hundred miles farther north, is the junction of the Vladivostok branch and Port Arthur branch of the Siberian Railroad. Reports of a Russian invasion of Korea and a Japanese invasion of Manchuria are not lacking, but they are vague and contradictory. It is probable, however, that Russian troops have crossed the Yalu River near its mouth and occupied the Korean city of Wiju.

The act of the Czar in abolishing the censorship upon dispatches sent to foreign papers by correspondents in Russia, is hailed as "the most important event since the emancipation of the serfs." Perhaps it is scarcely that, but it marks a step in the growth of liberal ideas and will not only enable the world to get truer ideas of what is going on in Russia, but will give Russia the benefit of foreign criticisms based upon knowledge of the facts. This abolition of censorship of course does not apply to the scene of war.

Russia has replied favorably to Secretary Hay's note and has given assurance that the war will be confined within the narrowest possible limits, and that neutral territory—including China, but not including Manchuria—will not be invaded.

Some students of international affairs profess to find in the present situation adequate grounds for anticipating a war which will involve all the important European powers. The seriousness of the situation arises from a complication of the sympathies and animosities growing out of the far eastern embroglio and a peculiarly acute phase of the standing Balkan problem. There is apparently danger that Turkey, seizing the opportunity when Russia is preoccupied, will attack Bulgaria and attempt to win back one of her lost provinces. Just what provocation Bulgaria is giving for this action, it is impossible to say, but it is reported that, while preserving the forms of diplomatic propriety, she is encouraging more Macedonian uprisings and otherwise provoking the enmity of Turkey. An attack by Turkey on Bulgaria would be a spark in a powder magazine. If the impulses and affinities of twenty years ago hold good, it would mean that Great Britain and her allies would be plunged into war on behalf of Bulgaria, while Russia and the Triple Alliance (with the possible exception of Italy) would take the side of Turkey. The Russian-Japanese war has had the effect of rendering international friendships and estrangements more acute. England is drawing closer to Japan; Germany and Austria are showing a warmer friendship for Russia; while France, whose enthusiasm for the Russian alliance has been cooling for some time, is becoming still less enthusiastic. All this would make it easier for the powers to line up for a general war if a disturbance in the Balkans should seem to require it. And yet we do not believe that there will be a general European war. It is pointed out by those who take the contrary view, that in some respects the situation is like that in the time of Napoleon. But there is a great difference—there is no Napoleon now, and without some masterful and irrepressible personality demanding war, it will scarcely be possible for all Europe again to become involved in a general conflict. Besides, however one may make light of the Hague Tribunal, it is a fact that the spirit of peace is growing and it is harder for nations to go to war than it was a generation or a century ago.

The committees appointed by the general assemblies of the Presbyterian (North) and Cumberland Presbyterian Churches to prepare a basis upon which the two bodies might unite, held a harmonious and successful session in St. Louis last week. The nineteen members of the two committees came to a unanimous agreement, not only as to the desirability and feasibility of union, but in regard to the basis upon which union should be effected. The basis of union which the joint committee has prepared will be submitted to the general assemblies of the respective churches which meet during May. It is recommended that the question of union shall then be submitted to the three hundred or more presbyteries of the two churches, and if there is a substantial majority in favor of union, the two churches shall, at their general assemblies in May, 1905, be declared reunited. The following statement, which we quote from the proposed basis of union, will show the general tenor of the document:

We believe that the union of Christian churches of substantially similar faith and polity would be to the glory of God, the good of mankind and the strengthening of Christian testimony at home and abroad.

We believe that the manifest providential development and leadings in the two churches since their separation, together with present conditions of agreement and fellowship, have been and are such as to justify their reunion.

The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church shall be united as one church, under the name and style of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, possessing all the legal and corporate rights and powers which the separate churches now possess.

The union shall be effected on the doctrinal basis of the confession of faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, as revised in 1903, and of its other doctrinal and ecclesiastical standards; and the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments shall be acknowledged as the inspired Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice.

In adopting the confession of faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, as revised in 1903, as a basis of union, it is mutually recognized that such agreement now exists between the systems of doctrine contained in the confessions of faith of the two churches as to warrant this union—a union honoring alike to both. Mutual acknowledgment also is made of the teaching and defense of essential evangelical doctrine held in common by these churches, and of the divine favor and blessing that have made this common faith and service effectual.

It is also recognized that liberty of belief exists by virtue of the provisions of the declaratory statement, which is part of the confession of faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, and which states that "the ordination vow of ministers, ruling elders and deacons, as set forth in the form of government, requires the reception and adoption of the confession of faith, only as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures."

It was the part of wisdom to base the reunion upon the present substantial agreement of the two churches, and to leave untouched the question as to how this agreement had come about. If there was a disagreement half a century ago, and if there is agreement now, it would seem that one body or the other must have changed. When the Presbyterians found it expedient to amend their confession of faith, they took pains to explain that this action did not indicate a change of faith, but was only meant as a further explanation of the things they had always believed. The non-Presbyterian world has never been persuaded to take this view of the matter quite seriously. It thought the changed creed must indicate a changed faith. So in the present instance it will be prone to insist that the reunion indicates a change on the part of one or both of the uniting churches. But if the high contracting parties look at it differently, we shall be satisfied to accept their view and congratulate them on having discovered, after three quarters of a century of separation, that they are both occupying the same ground and have been doing so all along. One of the wisest paragraphs of the whole report is that which says: "It should be regarded as the duty of all our judicatories, ministers and people to study the things which make for peace, to guard against all needless and offensive references to the causes which have divided us, and to avoid the revival of past issues."

Mr. Murphy, the leader of Tammany Hall, has reproved some prominent members of that organization who publicly hailed Judge Parker as Tammany's candidate for the Democratic nomination for the presidency. His own personal choice, he says, is Mr. Cleveland, but he urges that delegates to the nominating convention should not be hampered by positive instructions from their respective states. This may mean that the Tammany leader wants to keep open the door of hope for Mr. McClellan, the Tammany mayor of New York, who might conceivably get the votes of the majority of delegates on a compromise, but could not possibly hope to have very many delegations instructed in his favor in advance. But, McClellan aside, there is some practical sense in Mr. Murphy's appeal for uninstructed delegations. It looks now as if there would have to be a good deal of give and take in the convention, and perhaps only by compromise will it be possible to get a majority in favor of any candidate.

City people who live in flats have discovered that an uproar in the apartment above or below may be almost as unpleasant as if it were in one's own house. The governments on this western hemisphere are very close to each other in this day of rapid transit and international interests, and the United States finds some of them very noisy neighbors. The little republic of San Domingo, always turbulent, has been making more than her fair share of disturbance during the past few months, and last week American interests and forces were so directly involved that it may become necessary for us to take a hand more seriously than we have done heretofore. The United States consulate at Samana was broken into by a band of insurgents. A launch from the gunboat "Yankee" was fired upon and Machinist Johnson was killed. The Clyde steamship "New York" was fired upon while entering a harbor convoyed by the United States war ship "Newark." A group of men from a United States gun boat were fired upon, although they were carrying a white flag. In return for these outrages, the cruiser "Columbia" bombarded a town near the capital. The repeated rebellions and counter-rebellions of the past few months have made it apparent that there is no security for American or other foreign interests except such as can be secured by the constant presence of war ships. Even this means is ineffective, for it often means punishment for outrages rather than the prevention of them. Mr. Loomis, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, is going to the West Indies on a tour of investigation, presumably to make a report upon the exact condition of affairs so that the administration may shape its course accordingly, and it is reported as probable that the entire naval board may visit the island for the same purpose.

A Noisy Neighbor.

The most obvious plan that can be suggested for the preservation of order in San Domingo is the annexation of the island to the United States. It will be remembered that President Grant favored this plan in 1870 and sent a commission to San Domingo, of which Andrew D. White was a member, to report upon the resources and condition of the island. The commission reported favorably in regard to annexation, and that course would probably have been followed had it not been for the opposition of Senator Sumner. President Grant anticipated that the negro problem in the United States might become a serious one, and it was his idea that in San Domingo negro states could be organized which would be governed entirely by that race and would have the rights and responsibilities of members of the Federal union. Whatever may have been the desirability of this plan thirty years ago, it cannot be looked upon as anything but a last resort at the present time. Of course it is not improbable that events might render it necessary for us to assume the responsibility for governing a people who have long since proven themselves incapable of self government, but such a course would be fraught with dangers and difficulties. The agricultural and mineral resources of the island are no reason why we should desire it. But something will have to be done; if not annexation, then some other form of control. If we do not feel equal to the task, we will have to recall the Monroe doctrine and turn the job over to the first European power whose citizens are maltreated and whose interests are ignored by the lawless government of San Domingo.

It has been agreed that a vote shall be taken on the new Panama canal treaty in the Senate on Feb. 23. There does not seem to be any way by which it can fail if it comes to a vote, for only fifteen Senators have declared themselves positively against it. But experience has taught us that there is nothing certain in connection with isthmian canal negotiations. General Reyes, who was elected President of Colombia before he had finished his diplomatic mission at Washington, is now in Paris trying to persuade the stockholders in the Panama Canal Company that they cannot legally sell the company's property to the United States without the consent of Colombia. The obvious reply of the stockholders will be that they can afford to risk it if the United States can.

Brevities.

The bill granting a loan of $4,600,000 to the St. Louis World's Fair has been passed by both houses of Congress. The loan is secured by a lien on the gate receipts.

The election of Isador Rayner to the United States Senate from Maryland is considered a defeat for Mr. Gorman. Mr. Rayner, who will be best remembered as counsel for Admiral Schley before the Court of Inquiry, defeated both Carter, Mr. Gorman's candidate, and Ex-Governor Smith who has been the leader of the movement for the disfranchisement of the negroes in Maryland.

The latest reports from the far east (Tuesday morning) tell of the sinking of two more Russian battleships and the capture of four torpedo boats at Port Arthur by Japan. The torpedo boat is the newest, the most mobile, and the most uncertain element of modern naval warfare. In our war with Spain we demonstrated the value of torpedo boats as a means of defense.

Tammany's Position.

Unconquered Land.—VII.

Our Relation to Other Religious Bodies.

The question of relationship is so fundamental to any correct and comprehensive knowledge of duties and obligations, that it is to be regretted, though perhaps it is not to be wondered at, that there should remain some confusion of thought among us touching our relation to other religious bodies. It must be evident that we must know ourselves—what we are and what we stand for—and the other and older religious movements that are operating in the same general field, and come to a correct understanding of what relation our own movement bears to them, before we are fully prepared to accomplish the work which God has for us to do. We invite our readers, therefore, to a careful and candid study with us of this subject, without passion or prejudice, without the bias of sectarianism, on the one hand, or the easy-going indifference which regards all theories, systems and churches as equally good, on the other.

We can only reach correct conclusions on this subject in the light of history, including, of course, the inspired history of the New Testament. In this light the following general propositions would seem so clear as to admit of no controversy among Protestants.

1. Jesus Christ established His church in the world, on the rock-truth of His own Messiahship and divinity, in the first half of the first century of our era.

2. He never established but one church, and there is but one church in the world, and that church has never ceased to exist from Pentecost to the present time.

3. That church became very corrupt in its doctrine, ordinances, government, worship and its moral life, making a religious reformation essential to the fulfillment of its great mission in the world.

4. The Reformation of the sixteenth century under Martin Luther, did not aim to establish a new church, but to correct the errors and abuses in the church which Christ had established, but which had departed from the simplicity which is in Christ. Martin Luther did not see all the truth, but he saw with great clearness, and emphasized with great power and effectiveness a few cardinal truths, such as the sufficiency of the Bible without tradition, justification by faith and freedom of individual judgment from the tyranny of the pope or the church.

5. This opened the way for the successive reformations which followed under Calvin, Knox, Wesley and others in the Old World, and under Thomas and Alexander Campbell, Barton W. Stone and others in the New World. All of these reformatory movements had for their common aim the correction of errors in doctrine or polity in the existing church, and the propagation of certain principles which they held to be important to the well-being of the church, and all of them appealed to the Holy Scriptures as the authority for what they taught and practiced.

6. Since the Protestant Reformation, and indeed since the division between the eastern and western churches, with Constantinople and Rome as the competing centers of authority, the church has existed in a divided condition. Its division walls, however, have not been built by divine authority, and how to remove them and to restore the unity of the body of Christ has been the problem of the ablest minds from the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries.

On this historic back-ground it is easy to see the necessity for such a movement as that which the Disciples of Christ represent, and which had its origin near the beginning of the nineteenth century on the virgin soil of America. It was a movement born in the fullness of time, the logical outcome of the thought and struggles of centuries. The problem was, how to conserve the unity of the church without interfering with the principle of individual liberty. It was an effort to solve this problem that gave rise to the reformation of the nineteenth century. While it had the common aim of previous reformations, of seeking to correct existing evils in the church by bringing it into closer conformity to the Scriptures, it differed from them in the comprehensiveness of its aim—the unification of the body of Christ—and in its method, which was that of restoration, or of going back behind all human creeds to the original source of authority, and sitting at the feet of Christ as the world's only authoritative Teacher of the things of the Kingdom of God. Latest born of the great historic movements in the church seeking its purification and its closer conformity to the divine will, it would be strange if it did not embody some conceptions of the Bible, of the religion of Christ, and of its adaptation to human needs, which have been the heritage from previous centuries of spiritual travail and progress.

But does the fact, if it be a fact, that coming later we have made an advance upon previous movements, conserving what truth they have learned and taught and adding thereto some new light which has broke forth from God's word, together with the comprehensive aim of promoting the unity of all Christ's followers, put us into antagonistic relations with the great Protestant movements which have preceded us? Many have thought so in the past, who, representing the older movements; regarded our success as dangerous to their own interests and to the welfare of the church. This awakened very naturally a similar sentiment of antagonism among us, and the war went on for many years with a fierceness that was born of the idea that we were natural enemies instead of allies.

It is a very noticeable fact that a great change has come about in the relations between the churches and ministers of the Disciples of Christ, and those of the other religious bodies about us. We are now co-operating with them in such great interdenominational movements as the Y. M. C. A., the Y. P. S. C. E., the international Sunday-school movement and many other forms of united activity. Does this change imply any falling away from the principles of our movement; or does it imply a truer and juster appreciation of what is involved in such principles? The answer to this question we must postpone for another article.

Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise.

There are only a few ruling ideas that control the world, and shape the course of human history. If we get firm hold of these, or rather if they get firm hold of us, and mould our lives and characters, we have not lived in vain, but have helped forward the great purposes of God. We mention some of these.

1. This is God's World. He created it for Himself and His children, and He has redeemed it, and intends to occupy it. There used to be an idea that this world belonged to the devil, and that the most God expected was to save a few elect souls out of the wreck and leave the earth to float forever as a moral derelict in the sea of immensity. But we have come to see that His program is something very different from that. He proposes to drive the devil out of this world as an intruder, fill it with righteousness and peace, build here among men the city of God, and make it the glorious abode of His redeemed and sanctified children.

2. God's Self-revelation. In order to the accomplishment of this end, God has been revealing Himself to men through the ages past in creation, in providence, in history, and in human nature and human experience. But in this process of self-disclosure, God sent His Son into the world, who, becoming man, manifested God under human conditions. He was God manifest in the flesh. Being found in fashion as a man, He became obedient unto death that He might reveal God's love for men, and so bring men to God. Existing in the form of God, he esteemed not this equality with God a prize too good to be surrendered, but emptied Himself, voluntarily assumed certain limitations, that He might, by becoming man, win all men back to God. The universe contains no greater thought, no fact so thrilling, as this stooping down of the infinite to finite conditions to save finite men.

3. The Holy Spirit's Mission. In furtherance of the same great end, the Holy Spirit was sent after Christ's glorification, to carry forward the work of sanctification in the church, and to lead it on in the great enterprise of world-wide evangelization. He came to perfect us in Christian growth and to equip us for service in carrying out Christ's program of winning the world for Him.

4. The Mission of the Church. For no other purpose was the church established, than to further God's great enterprise of occupying this world with His kingdom. Apostles and prophets, martyrs and heroes, lived and wrought and died that God's purpose concerning this world might be carried out, and that His principles of truth, righteousness, love and mercy might be incorporated in the life of mankind.

5. The Law of Christ's Sacrifice is the law of life. "Let this mind which was in Christ Jesus, be also in you." In no other way can the individual soul, or the church, or the state, or civilization come to greatness, except by self-emptying, voluntary sacrifice, for the welfare of those less blessed than ourselves. In the exact proportion that men and institutions yield themselves to this law of life, losing their life that they may find it, does God enter into them and enrich and bless them. Look at the men and the women who are giving themselves most devotedly to this great enterprise of missions, whether as missionaries in the field, missionary secretaries or pastors, and note how God has enlarged and enriched them. Notice how God has blessed the churches that have entered into fellowship with Him in this Great Enterprise. We speak of it as reflex influence. But it is simply the fulfillment of Christ's promise, "Lo, I am with you always."

These are the greatest and the most ruling ideas of the world, and they are all missionary ideas. What we call the march of civilization is but the progressive realization, in the life of the world, of these great truths and principles. If we expect God to bless and use us, as a religious body, let us throw ourselves with sublime abandon into this majestic enterprise of world-wide missions.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Morning is beautiful in any part of the world where we have been, but nowhere does it clothe itself with more gorgeous beauty than here in semi-tropical Florida. This is particularly true here on the East Coast, where Aurora, the rosy-fingered, must needs come in her chariot of light across the watery pavement of the Atlantic. This morning Bay Biscayne was a sea of glass, and we watched the kindling fires of the east from the first faint flush of white light, until it reddened into a crimson glow far out beyond the Key. Soon the dark line of Keys, eight miles out, which protect this coast from the ocean waves, rose out of the mists, and made the bay look like a broad river. As we sit on the veranda, yet in the early morning penning these lines, the tall pines do not nod their plumes, nor do the palm branches stir in the stillness of this early hour. In an hour the trade winds from the southeast will blow a gentle breeze. The notes of a mocking bird, which since early dawn have delighted us, still continue, as if life, for that particular songster, at least, was felt to be worth the living. The whole scene as it spreads out before us this morning is one that would delight the eyes of our readers who live in the regions where snow and ice abound at this season. Palms, palmettoes, banana trees, citrons, fruits, an early garden with cabbage, lettuce, potatoes, tomatoes, beans, strawberries, and over all a soft blue sky, and a balmy atmosphere—but these are enough, we are sure to make our readers "cast a wistful eye" in this direction. But it is comforting to know that most of these things, and the best of them, will soon come to those in the north who wait for them.

Some have said to us, "I am not able to see the situation at Cocanut Grove, very clearly, from what you have written about it." It is not a very easy scene to depict with pen. Perhaps we shall be able to send a few pictures later that may give a better idea. But even these would fail to give a general view of the landscape and water-scapes of Cocanut Grove and vicinity. Imagine a pine ridge, not high, but sufficiently elevated above the sea, and a level savanna of a varying width of from one hundred to three hundred yards, which borders the shore line, to give an extensive view of the bay and of the Key Biscayne out eight miles, running parallel with the shore. In front, then, is the bay, and beyond this the ocean proper, while in the rear of this plateau of pines are the Everglades, at the northern extremity of which is lake Okeechobee. It is the theory of scientists which all the facts seem to confirm, that the Everglades was once a part of the bay, and that this plateau of pines and coral limestone, was a coral island. Cocanut Grove is an older settlement than Miami, which is now putting on airs as a seaport city. It is more aristocratic in its society, and contains more literary celebrities. The bay front for a mile north and south of the "Peacock Inn," is occupied with a good class of residences, besides Paul Ransom's "Pine-Knot Camp," a unique institution for boys whose health compels them to come to a milder climate for the winter. The place is elegantly fitted up, and elegant charges are made for admission. We are located near the southern extremity of this Bay settlement, commanding one of the finest views, as we think, of the Bay Biscayne, of the Key Biscayne beyond, of the old light house on the southern extremity of the Key, and of the new light house further south. Here we have a little patch of ground, with some young trees coming on, and some day we may erect a small cottage on it as a refuge to which we may fly from the winter's cold.

This community has just been blessed with a visit from Miss Rebel Withers, of Ocoee, Fla., and of Lexington, Ky. She divides the year between the two states. She is traveling in the interest of the Christian Endeavor Union of Florida, and came to Cocanut Grove for the purpose of organizing a Junior Society in this place, which she succeeded in doing. The Congregational pastor here turned his morning service into a children's meeting, which Miss Withers addressed in a most interesting and profitable way, and then delivered an address at night on Christian Endeavor to a full house. She meets with a ready acceptance wherever she goes, and the best churches are put at her service. While working for Christian Endeavor she does not conceal her own church relation nor what the people she is connected with stand, for on all proper occasions. She possesses unusual gifts and tact for the work she is doing, and seems fully consecrated to it. We had a delightful visit with her during her stay here and while on a charming sail out on the bay, under the seamanship of Bro. W. A. H. Hobbs and son. This sail of about three hours was her only respite from earnest work while here. She will probably find it necessary to modify the strenuousness of her work, if she is to hold out. She has proved and is proving a great blessing to Florida. May the number of such "Rebels" increase until the whole country shall be in rebellion against the kingdom of Satan!

Speaking of rebels and rebellion, leads us to say that we have just finished reading Gen. J. B. Gordon's "Reminiscences of the Civil War." We have found it intensely interesting, and remarkably fair and non-sectional in its statements and general estimates of men and measures. It would be too much to say that his views are in no way influenced by his connection with the war, for that, of course, would be impossible, but we have never read a fairer book, nor one marked by a truer American spirit, nor by a loftier patriotism. The book is lighted up with incidents showing the heroism and magnanimity of the soldiers on both sides. The reading of the book will distinctly increase one's admiration for the American soldier, and if he be a northern reader, will increase his admiration for the undaunted heroism and sublime courage of the boys in gray, who, with privations unknown to northern soldiers, fought for a cause they believed to be sacred. We regret now that it was not our privilege to have met and heard Gen. Gordon before his death, for to men of his spirit we must look for the cementing of those bonds of fraternity which alone can make perpetual the union of states in a supreme and glorious nationality. This was our own feeling, even during the war, and since that time, by voice and pen, we have pled for the union of Americans, on patriotic love of the Union and the Constitution, in spite of political differences, just as we have pled for the union of Christians, based on faith and in obedience to Christ, in spite of theological differences. There is a beautiful consistency in these two positions, which suggest that they are both based on the same fundamental principles of right and truth.

What important events have transpired since we left St. Louis! Who can forecast the outcome of the war in the East? The heavy battalions are with Russia, but the moral advantage is with Japan. But having received a kingdom which cannot be shaken, no matter what issue that war may have, let us bend our energies to the extension of that kingdom over all the world. Prepare well for the March offering. Let all the churches swing into line. Be swift in contributing funds for our World's Fair building. Let us "believe in God and keep the fires burning."

Questions and Answers.

What is the meaning of the word paradise in Luke 23:43? Where is it located?

The word here evidently means heaven or the abode of the blessed. In this utterance from the cross, our Lord was not talking about the geography of paradise, but was declaring the great spiritual truth that there is always hope for the sinner who sees his own sinfulness and, confessing his sins, trusts in Christ for salvation. The main point is that the faith of the penitent thief was counted to him for righteousness, and not that he should this day occupy such and such a spot in the physical universe.

Is it right for Christians to spend money for fire insurance and life insurance, or should we trust God's care for the preservation of life and property?

We should do both—trust God's care and carry insurance. Faith in God does not absolve us from the duty of taking all reasonable precautions to avert the calamities of life and to guard ourselves and our families against the hardships which those calamities may involve. It is as proper to carry insurance as to carry umbrellas. Both avert some of the unpleasant features of events which transpire in accordance with God's wise and beneficent laws.

When Jesus asked Peter, "lovest thou me more than these?" (John 21:15) did he mean more than these other disciples, or more than these fishes and nets? In the debate between Alexander Campbell and Bishop Purcell, the former said it referred to the fishes or earthly possessions, while the latter said it meant the other disciples. What is your interpretation?

On this point we must side with the Bishop against Mr. Campbell. The weight of scholarship is on that side. This interpretation, however, gives no support to the Catholic doctrine of the primacy of Peter among the apostles. Our Lord's question rather refers back to Peter's former profession of superior fidelity: "If all shall be offended in thee, I will never be offended" (Matt. 26:33)—a profession which was soon belied by his thrice-repeated denial. Peter had learned modesty by that experience, and now when Jesus asked him if he loved Him more than the others did, he only answered, "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." The question implies rather a rebuke than a confirmation of Peter's assumption of superiority.

What is the meaning of Phil. 1:23? Our Sunday-school superintendent says that the expression, "the desire to depart and be with Christ" should be rendered "the desire for the returning of Christ."

There is no ground whatever for this rendering, and it would destroy the meaning of the passage. Paul is balancing the desirability of two things: life, with its opportunity for continued service, and death which would bring the immediate reward for his past labors.

Would Jesus belong to any of the fraternal orders if he were here?

We do not know. Jesus did a great many things when he was on earth, that the people of his time did not expect him to do. He ate with publicans and sinners, and took advantage of almost every opportunity of getting close to men. It is not impossible that he might use the fraternal orders in the same way if he were here now. If he did, it would not be for the sake of his own enjoyment, but as a means of social service.

1. Should we observe Easter with special sermons, songs, etc., as the annual festival in commemoration of Christ's resurrection?

2. If we have an annual celebration of the resurrection, is it in order and is it necessary to keep any more days during the year to commemorate the same event?

1. We see no impropriety in the special observance of Easter. It is a time when, by habit and custom, men's thoughts are turning toward one theme and if we can take advantage of that occasion to impress some religious truths more effectually than at other seasons, there is good reason for doing so. Every Lord's day is a celebration of Christ's resurrection, but as a matter of practice it is impossible to keep that theme in the foreground in the sermons and songs of every Lord's day service. Yet certainly that theme ought to receive explicit treatment sometime, and surely the anniversary of the event is a no less appropriate time than a Sunday chosen at random would be.

2. If any congregation feels that the observance of Easter obscures the fact that every Lord's day is observed in commemoration of Christ's resurrection, then it would be better for that congregation to let Easter pass unobserved. We can see no reason, however, why an annual service in which the sermon and the songs bear upon the theme of the resurrection should in any way discount the weekly assembly for prayer and praise and edification upon the day of the week which our Lord sanctified by his resurrection.

Notes and Comments.

No man knows what the gospel is unless he knows it well enough to see that all men need it.

The missionary spirit has been the salvation of many a church. When a church is in debt, is discouraged and knows not which way to turn, the best remedy is the cultivation of the New Testament spirit of missions.

It has been said, and truly, that the missionary offering of a church, like a mirror, reflects its real life and character. Loud protestations of orthodoxy and soundness in the faith are inconsistent if a church is not doing its part toward the evangelization of the whole world.

We most heartily endorse the suggestion of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to the effect that the editors of our papers representing various shades of thought in regard to matters about which there is some cleavage among us, meet in friendly and brotherly conference, with the view of reaching an understanding by which we can all work together as brethren in Christ. We have entertained an idea of this kind for some time, and are now in correspondence with a prominent brother who objects to the use of missionary societies, organs, etc., looking to something of this sort. It must be taken for granted that those occupying different points of view in regard to these matters, are honest and want to do right; and this being the case, the proposed conference ought to do good, and certainly can do no harm. Shall we have it?—The Christian Companion.

We should be glad to see a further expression of opinion on this subject, especially from our editorial brethren who do not see their way to co-operating with their brethren for the spread of the gospel through missionary societies. The Christian Companion has a strong editorial under the title, "Cleavage" which evinces a clear grasp of the principle by which these lines of cleavage may be avoided.

It is gratifying to note these clear editorial utterances from that journal, under its new editorial management.

The Sixth of March, Remember

By F. D. Power

When I asked the Japanese minister, who lives near my church, "What is the attitude of your government toward missions?" he answered, "Every way favorable. It is our desire to adopt everything that is good in your western civilization, and we regard your civilization as founded upon the Christian religion."

That is a just tribute. Japan has made great strides in material things and in the realm of intellectual progress. It may be questioned, however, whether she has caught the deeper and richer things that belong to our institutions; nor is this possible until she becomes in the best sense Christian. We ourselves are not yet perfect examples. Our army budget carries $70,000,000, and our navy takes this year $96,000,000. Besides, $150,000,000 will be spent on account of our civil war pensions. This means that America's war bill for 1904 is $310,000,000!

How much are we giving to make our land a Christian land? Japan is fighting Russia at a fearful cost of blood and treasure. What is she doing for the moral uplift of her own people? "Give me the money that has been spent in war," one has said, "and I will purchase every foot of land on the globe. I will clothe every man, woman and child in an attire of which kings and queens would be proud. I will build a schoolhouse on every hillside and in every valley over the whole earth. I will build an academy in every town, and endow it; a college in every state, and fill it with able professors. I will crown every hill with a place of worship, consecrated to the promulgation of the gospel of peace. I will support in every pulpit an able teacher of righteousness, so that on every Sunday morning the chime on one hill should answer to the chime on another round the earth's wide circumference; and the voice of prayer, and the song of praise should ascend like a universal holocaust to heaven."

But we cannot command these wasted millions. Nation will go to war with nation until the world shall have been Christianized. Meantime the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ must sustain the work of the Lord Jesus Christ. We must give, and pray, and proclaim the message of the Prince of Peace until "He shall judge among the nations and shall rebuke many people; and they shall turn their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

One thing we may well imitate in the war-like spirit that still sways men, and that is their enthusiasm. Could we put the same ardor and intensity of passion in the missionary cause, the world would be speedily won for our great Leader. Pollard, the historian, tells of a young confederate soldier, wounded in the breast, who was being carried off the field after the battle of Manassas, by his comrades, when an officer expressed his sympathy. "'Yes, yes!' was the reply, 'they have done for me now; but my father's there yet! Our army is there yet! Our cause is there yet!' and raising himself from the arms of his companions, his face lighting up like a sunbeam, he cried with an enthusiasm I shall never forget, 'And Liberty is there yet!'" And he swooned away. Fancy such enthusiasm for the conquest of the regions beyond, burning in the breasts of the soldiers of the Cross! Only one people have seemed to be thus on fire for missions, and these, the Moravians. This story is told of an old Moravian woman. A friend called upon her with sadness in his looks. "Your son," said he to the mother, "is gone." "Is Thomas gone to heaven through the missionary life? Would to God that he would call my son John!" John became a missionary, and he fell. And this time the committee were very sad; but before opening their lips, the old woman anticipated their story and exclaimed, "Thank God! Would that he would call my last son, William!" And William, too, went and fell; when the noble woman exclaimed, "Would that I had a thousand sons to give to God!" Such enthusiasm for missions is needed now in mothers and sons, and in the whole Church of Christ.

March 6 should be a day among us long to be remembered. It should be a day of holy inspirations, a day of great deeds. Beyond, sitting in the regions of darkness, are a thousand millions for whom Christ died, and yet without the knowledge of Christ. We hear our Captain's command: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." As a body of Christians, more than a million strong, we have set apart this one day, out of the 366 days in the year 1904, in which to offer to our Lord the means necessary to carry out these marching orders. A little sum of a quarter of a million dollars out of the millions we possess is asked for this transcendent cause. Shall we not give it? Shall we not give it cheerfully, hilariously, with a swing and a cheer? Shall we not be forever ashamed to face our religious neighbors who give their millions, if we, with all our claims, fall short of our duty here? Shall we not forget forever the day of little things, and plan large things and perform large things, giving as Christian men would give to their Christ?

We can not all go to China, India, Japan, or Africa. We are not all called to the work of missionaries, but we may send forth laborers and sustain them. We are all stewards of God's gifts, trustees of his gospel, and debtors to his lost world. We are not all Peabodys or Carnegies with millions to give, but we all have some means, and our combined offerings would far out-measure the bounty of these men. The devil's word is "Spare thyself," but Christ's word is "Deny thyself," and a moderate degree of self-denial on the part of a million of Christian men and women would place in the hands of our missionary society, not an offering of twenty-five cents apiece, but of one dollar apiece for this great service when the first Lord's day in March rolls around. If we can not use our feet and go at our Master's bidding, let us use our hands and give that others may bear the message. Somewhere in Africa is a lazaret-house for lepers, surrounded with walled-in gardens and fields, and within which no one in health is admitted; and the sufferers, once in, are allowed no return to the outer world. An English missionary from a hilltop once saw the inmates at work. He noticed two men sowing peas in a field; one had no hands, the other had no feet, these having been wasted away by the disease. The one with no hands was carrying on his back the one with no feet, who carried a bag, from which he dropped a pea now and then, which the other pressed into the ground with his feet. The missionary uses his feet; it is for us to use our hands, and give him the seed to drop into the soil.

Christians need a high standard. Nehemiah sent word to the men that would terrify him: "I am doing a great work, so that I can not come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?" Great powers are not content to wrestle with trifles. Alexander had presented to him an Indian dog, as a sort of dog-Alexander. To try him, the Macedonian made various heroic or heraldic beasts to be let loose against him: first a stag, but the dog lay still; then a wild boar; he lay still; then a bear; he lay still. Alexander was on the point of condemning him, when a lion was let forth: the dog rose, and tore the lion to pieces. Any true warrior wants a foeman worthy of his steel. In the mighty undertaking of saving the heathen world, the church has a great work, the forces of Christianity are put upon their mettle, the gospel is subjected to its supreme test. As to the issue there can be no question. The great thing is to connect the gospel with the needs of men. Applied Christianity is as certain as applied mathematics. The "vast undone" challenges us. Our high calling of God in Christ Jesus is the evangelization of the whole world. Let our offering be commensurate with the magnitude of the undertaking.

The Promise of Our English Work

By William Durban

After twenty years from the inauguration of the mission in England, undertaken by the American Foreign Christian Missionary Society, how does that enterprise stand to-day? I am bound to admit that we are still in the pioneering stage. The new number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, which lies before me as I write, revives vivid memories of the days in the early eighties, for J. H. Garrison resuscitates these in the interesting allusions to his experiences in England. His occasion for his remarks is found in the piteous article by W. L. Spayd, written from South Africa, concerning the treatment meted out to him by the Old Brethren, as they are usually styled in this country. I am glad that Brother Garrison, in the year of his sojourn in England, gained the advantage of personal knowledge of the cross-currents of religious sentiment created by the persistent policy of the Old Brethren. I am not in the habit of criticising any good people who differ from me in theology, in theory or in practice. It is more becoming to rejoice in whatever good they may accomplish; and in this case I am glad to say that these peculiar and uncompromising Christians certainly receive much more Christian charity from our side than we do from their side. Our attitude has uniformly been one of invitation, theirs of repulsion. They are doubtless perfectly conscientious, but if they give us any credit for sincerity, they appear to do so with so cold a reserve of their sentiment that we are rarely permitted to perceive it.

The lamentation of Brother Spayd would be amusing to many of us if it were not painfully suggestive of similar experiences, such as Brother Garrison records. Yet I do not abandon all hope of a concordat, though I do not expect myself to live to see it either formulated or ratified. Some of the dearest friends and kindest helpers I have are "Old Brethren." There are at two pretty villages in the county of Cheshire two little Churches of Christ belonging to that fellowship. When during arduous years I was building up a Baptist Church at the city of Chester, these simple and loving Christians were amongst the greatest benefactors of the work. We not only gathered an important church together, but erected a costly edifice, and continually these Saughall and Mollington Old Brethren were contributing of their means, inviting me to their sweet rural homes, and pouring encouragement into my heart. I have not forgotten. And when afterwards I became one of the Disciples of Christ and worked along these lines in London, I in my simplicity assumed that the whole of the Old Brotherhood would be of the beautiful spirit of my dearly beloved Cheshire friends. I fancied I had come very much nearer to the Old Brotherhood. Alas! I was made to feel that there were hard and sour spirits as well as gracious and lovely souls in the same communion. I found amongst the leaders of the Old Brotherhood, while I am thankful to say all were not alike, a deep and invincible animosity to the mission of the Disciples of Christ and to what is known as the American Movement.

As far as I can judge, that opposition is more pronounced to-day than ever. Here I trust I may be entirely wrong, but I write frankly according to the impressions produced. It is an extreme pleasure to mingle socially with many of the Old Brethren; but those who exercise ascendancy, and deserve to do so because of their commanding ability, appear to be rigidly fixed in their systematic rule of allowing communion and co-operation only with those who are in absolute theological harmony with themselves. I am unable to distinguish between this principle and that which constitutes the basis of popery.

Our Present Standing.

Thus, there are in England two bodies of Christians contending for truth in its primitive and apostolic simplicity. But, unfortunately, they are also contending with each other! If some of us could have our way, they would close up into one fellowship tomorrow. The division does no good. It does not answer the purpose which the Old Brethren claim that they on their part fulfill by vindicating conscience. Conscience is an entirely individual entity. Corporations have no conscience. I never knew any committee that had any conscience, though I have belonged to committees in which each man was truly conscientious. You cannot bundle a lot of consciences together and incorporate them into a single conscience. The Church of England has no conscience. It cannot have. A clergyman of that church usually has a conscience, but it is apt to be a very singular one, which constrains him to boycott all Free Churchmen. We have heard a great deal in England about the Non-conformist conscience, but nobody understands what this means. It is a very variable moral quantity, and indeed the term was invented by supercilious High Churchmen for the sake of ridicule. Now, I know that many Old Brethren have very beautiful individual consciences. They could conscientiously co-operate with us, and have tried to do so. But somehow when these friends bundle their consciences together, then they conclude that they "cannot conscientiously exchange pulpits," etc, etc. I will give a concrete instance to show that I am not indulging in abstract imaginings. One of the most eloquent of the younger preachers of the O. B. communion consented to exchange pulpits with one of the most influential of our preachers. The latter was very delighted, and came to me full of the pleasure very naturally thus created. I said I shared his joy, but from memories of some of my own experiences, I had my doubts within. These I refrained from expressing. In a few days I received a doleful letter. The "young Old Brother" had been interfered with. A sort of inquisition had been held. He was to be allowed to preach as arranged, but our own friend could in no wise be permitted to occupy the other rostrum in reciprocity.

"The Disciple Conscience."

I am thankful that I was led to become a Disciple of Christ in the sense attaching to that term amongst us. I am glad to be reckoned one of the great modern communion recognized by that name, as well as to feel that I belong to all who are disciples of the Savior, whatever may be other names by which they choose to be known. After almost twenty years of affiliation with these Christians, I have a right to utter a word of testimony. I have found that in such associations I enjoy complete freedom of conscience individually. I am conservative in some directions and radical in others. I find that some of my fellow Disciples of Christ are radical where I am conservative, and vice versa. I note that some of our young American scholars, preachers, pastors and professors hold, at least to some extent, views about the Bible and criticism for which Spurgeon would have excommunicated them, and which, if I may judge by what he has said to me, Dr. Pierson would sternly condemn. Now, it is fortunate for these somewhat advanced (perhaps almost recklessly advanced) brethren, that the glorious fellowship of the Disciples of Christ is not afflicted by the frightful incubus of a corporate conscience. Spurgeon destroyed his magnificent conference because he found many of its most brilliant young men preaching and writing in accordance with their individual promptings of conscience. I was present when the tragedy happened. Some of us expected to be permitted to exercise liberty of conscience. But the great leader could not stand such a claim, and many of us had to go, and the whole conference of many hundreds was dissolved, because it was a corporation without a collective conscience. Conscience is the inward monitor of individual motive. Vinet beautifully said that conscience is "the invisible thorn planted by God in the side of the soul to admonish it

The Crises of Missions

By L. A. Chapman

Dr. Pierson has written a book on the "Crisis of Missions," but I was just thinking that another book might be written on the "Crises of Missions" with great profit.

The Church has passed through many crises in its history, and the solution to all of its various crises has turned on the pivot of missions.

Permit me to illustrate what I mean by a reference to some of the principal crises in the history of the Christian era.

The church passed through a crisis in the Apostolic era. The Judaizers in the Jerusalem church and elsewhere were determined to overthrow the work of Paul. A great conflict was raging on the inside of the church. A council was called at Jerusalem to settle the controversy. A decision was reached, but the strife went on. What was done in this crisis? Paul kept right on preaching the gospel to the heathens until at length this Jewish bigotry was burned up like ropes of straw in the fire of missionary enthusiasm. It was the missionary spirit that solved this Judaistic problem and not the council at Jerusalem.

Again, we have the crisis of the bondage of the church in the Roman Empire. The church was truly in bonds. It was compelled to endure fiery persecutions. The Roman emperors tried to stamp out the new faith. The Empire was strong and the church was weak. This was certainly a great crisis through which the Church was compelled to pass. It was the conflict of Christianity with heathenism. How did it end? The last emperor who tried to stamp out the gospel of Christ was compelled to exclaim with his dying breath, "O, Galilean, thou hast conquered!" How was this victory achieved? By the intense enthusiasm of Christians, in spreading the gospel all over the Empire.

"Great Pan is dead," and it was the missionary spirit that killed him.

The next enemy that assailed the church was the Roman hierarchy. While the Roman Empire fell in 476 A. D., Rome still lived because she had fashioned for herself a home in the bosom of the Church.

While the Church had conquered Rome, the Roman spirit had conquered the Church. But the missionary spirit was still in the church and was kept burning on the tops of the mountains. I have but to mention men like St. Patrick, St. Augustine, Columba, Aiden, Boniface and Anskar, who brought the gospel to our fierce ancestors in the German forests and the British Isles, to convince the students of history that the missionary spirit was still alive. Was the power of the Roman church broken by a decree of a council? No!

It was the burning desire to give the Bible to the people which enabled the Reformers to break the power of Rome. The star that led them on was the supremacy of the Bible, the supremacy of faith, and the supremacy of the people. It was the spirit of Christ that burst the empty forms, and the spirit of Christ is the spirit of missions.

No sooner had the Reformation lost its first high impulse and sunken into the slough of dogmatism than there arose a new enemy in the Church—denominationalism. Our Protestant Christianity, with all its conflicting creeds, strife, hate, disintegration and death is certainly one of the greatest crises that the church has had to face.

We are not dealing with history now but with the living present, and we cannot but premise our faith. As God has guided the Church in the past so we believe He will continue to do in the future: The bonds of denominationalism will be broken. The Church will pass the crisis in safety.

As in the past it was the missionary spirit that triumphed over every difficulty, so we believe that the spirit of missions will solve our problem now and finally lead us safely to the unity and spirit of the Apostolic church.

Does any one think that denominationalism will ever be done away by a decree, or the unity of the Apostolic Church effected by an ecumenical council? Let him be undeceived at once. The past does not justify such a conclusion.

It was William Carey that lit the signal fires of a new era and inaugurated the cause of modern missions. The missionary movement of the nineteenth century, and of this the beginning of the twentieth century, is drawing all the discordant elements in the Church together. A common aim, common sacrifice, common suffering, a common purpose will draw all of God's people together into a common body as nothing else will.

Very substantial have been the gains of recent years; and in the promise of the future there may always be discerned the certain signs of the fulfillment of all our hopes. By steps which are never retraced the Church is drawing nearer to the goal; and the ideal itself is valuable, not indeed as something to be grasped by a frantic effort, but as a means of lightening by intelligent hope, the steps by which the people of God are destined to approach it.

Yes, the spirit of missions is the spirit of Christ, and the spirit of Christ is that of self-sacrifice and service. Jesus said, "Behold, I am in the midst of you as one that serveth."

Modern-missions are but an amplification of the idea of service which Jesus introduced into this world. The world cannot be converted until Christ's followers are united. Jesus prayed that his disciples might be one that the world might believe. And I, for one, believe that when the Church on earth is united we will not be very far removed from the final evangelization of the world.

The pillar of cloud is still going before us, and who knows but that modern missions have been raised up for such a time as this.

When the higher radical criticism would destroy the Bible, God raised up the science of Archeology and caused the very rocks to cry out in favor of the inspiration of the old volume.

So when Protestantism had become split up into various fragments and entangled in theological controversies and fraternal strife, and while the hosts of infidelity, materialism, and agnosticism were sweeping over Europe and America in apparent triumph, it was then that the cause of missions was thrust upon the world to end the strife and to unite in one common effort all the hosts of God for the greatest of all earthly enterprises—the evangelization of the world.

Hail to the cause of modern missions! Let the whole wide world rejoice! "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will to men!"

Let God's people move unitedly on the first Lord's day in March, and we will go beyond our slogan.

"A quarter of a million this year for foreign missions."

TIMELY CALLING

How the Pastor Saved a Life.

A man near Fort Gay, W. Va., made an entire failure in getting strength from the kind of food he ate, and not knowing that the trouble was with the food, kept on losing health until the doctors gave him up to die.

It was supposed to be consumption, because he was wasting away steadily and slowly dying. His minister called from time to time, and one day brought along a package of Grape-Nuts, thinking from what he knew of the famous food that perhaps it might help him. The sick man took to it at once, and from that day began to get well. In writing he says:

"I walked to town to-day 3 miles. Have gained over 40 pounds in about 2 months, and my neighbor don't know what to say. I frequently am told it was as if I am raised from the dead. Everybody here knows of my case, you can tell people to write to the postmaster or Rev. L. D. Bryan. I will make a sworn statement that Grape-Nuts saved my life." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

This is another illustration that where all other food fails, one can be brought back to health and strength on Grape-Nuts. "There's a reason."

The Imperialism of Missions.

By Geo. L. Peters.

Christianity is a religion of conquest. Its plans are imperial. The prophets who foretold the gospel age saw the universal triumph of the church. "The earth was to be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." The scion of the house of Jesse was to have world-wide and everlasting dominion.

Cæsar was the greatest of the Roman generals. He was the first to be dignified with the title Imperator; he first showed an ambition for world-wide conquest. But compared with Christ, Cæsar's vision was provincial. He was limited to a comparatively few nations, and a brief space of time; but Christ o'er-leaped all the ages, and with divine prescience sought the conquest of the race.

The spirit of the early church was imperial. Before three centuries had passed, the Roman Empire had been conquered. Political disaster did not dampen its ardor. The avalanche of barbarism from the north, which overwhelmed the Roman civilization, but added zest to their ambition for conquest, for it revealed new peoples to be evangelized. Even the Dark Ages with all of their blasting, withering blight could not quench the spirits of Christ-illuminated men like Assisi, Raymond Lull and Xavier, in whom the ambition to bring the nations to the feet of the Christ burned as an unquenchable fire. The ensign of the cross which fell from their hands was caught up by Carey, Judson and others, and handed on to us, to whom is given the most stupendous task, the grandest opportunity of all. Our world is the widest, the most populous, the most accessible of all, and our facilities for conquering it are the greatest.

Great undertakings require large means. The commercial conquest of a single empire enlists billions of dollars capital. This is business sagacity. What should its evangelization call forth? It is estimated that 500,000,000 of the earth's population have been won to Christ, while 1,000,000,000 still "bow down to wood and stone." According to the latest statistics only 1,315,544 of these acknowledge our Christ as Lord. Last year Protestant Christendom gave only $16,310,424 to win the Christless nations, $.016 for the salvation of a soul. We, the Disciples of Christ, a million and a quarter strong, are planning to give twenty cents apiece this year for this imperial enterprise. Have we a Christ-like vision of our task? This is no little business. It is an undertaking of the first magnitude, requiring the highest talent and the broadest liberality. May the imperialism of the gospel possess us until our plans shall reveal a proper conception of our Master's purposes.

The Materialist and the Man of Faith.

By A. M. Growden.

In the closing month of 1903 two men passed away on the same day. One lived in England, the Scientist Spencer, the other in America, H. Clay Trumbull. They have made studies of two distinct sciences, that of the material realm and the realm of faith. H. Clay Trumbull walked by faith, not by sight. Spencer walked by sight, not by faith.

The first accepted the simple definitions of creation; "In the beginning God. In the beginning God created." The heavens and the earth were to him the expressions of God's thoughts, for "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." Spencer defined matters: "A continuous change from indefinite incoherent homogeneity to definite coherent heterogeneity of structure and function, through successive differentiations and integrations." That which lies back of the universe is not a power, principle or law, but a Beneficent Being who sees, who hears, who loves.

Herein consisted the difference between the lives of these distinguished men. One, through the power of faith, saw the real meaning of life; the other touched only the material. He knew all about the atoms, but overlooked the Jewel. Man is material, but he is also a soul; not that he has a soul, he is a soul. The soul is the real being, the unity.

Dr. Trumbull was once visited by a book agent, who desired to sell a set of books. "No," said the doctor, "I haven't room for it. I do not care to buy." But the agent was persistent. "See," cried the doctor, "do those books of yours tell anything of the future?"

"No, sir, I guess not."

"Well, said the doctor, "I've got all the books I want about the past. Bring me a book that tells about the future and I'll buy it."

There was good philosophy in this. And so the future is greater than the past. I look backward and I see graves and disjointed work, as well as great achievements; but, what men have not done would fill a greater book than what they have accomplished. There must be something in the vast future that will outbalance it all.

What we see of man to-day cannot be all that God intended him to be. The man who looks to the future and keeps his soul in touch with God is getting the most out of life. Spencer knew nothing beyond his own observation; he was necessarily confined within a small compass and naturally said: "For years past, when watching the unfolding of the buds in spring, there has arisen the thought, shall I ever again see the buds unfold? Shall I ever again be awakened at dawn by the song of the thrush? Now that the end is not likely to be long postponed, there results an increasing tendency to meditate upon ultimate questions."

The question of first and ultimate importance is the kingdom of God. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God," was the injunction of the great Teacher.

Dr. Trumbull lived for two worlds: the one in which he found himself, and the one for which he prepared himself. He was a practical Christian philosopher. Too many men are philosophical at the expense of the practical. The best clause is this: I know whom I have believed.

Spencer directed that his ashes be buried without religious ceremony. But when the genial Christian worker breathed his last, just before the public funeral service, four who were near and dear to him knelt by the body, a sacred circle, and repeated:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

This had been his prayer for many years.

A sweet little child touched by the act said, "Father, is this heaven?"

Verily, the memory of the just is blessed.

We reduce life to the pettiness of our daily living: we should exalt our living to the grandeur of life.—Phillips Brooks.

DOCTOR EXPLAINS

His Article in the Medical Magazine
About Coffee

One of the most famous medical publications in the United States is the "Alkaloidal Clinic," in a recent number of which an entertaining article on coffee by a progressive physician and surgeon is published. In explaining his position in the matter, this physician recently said:

"In the article in question I really touched but lightly upon the merits of Postum Food Coffee. I have had several cases of heart trouble, indigestion and nervousness where a permanent cure was effected by merely using Postum in place of coffee without any other treatment.

"In my own family I have used Postum for three years, and my children actually cry for it and will not be satisfied with any other beverage. Indeed they refuse to eat until they have had the customary cup of Postum, and as it is a re-builder and does nothing but good, I am only too glad to let them have it.

"To get the best results we boil the Postum at least 20 minutes and it is then settled by adding a little cold water, then the addition of fresh cream makes a beverage I now prefer to the very best coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Authorities are agreed that Postum is a wonderfully quick and sure re-builder. Ten days' trial in place of coffee proves it.

More Preachers Needed.

By L. M. Sniff.

For eighteen years I have been at the head of a private school. Out from this school have gone into the Christian ministry fifty-three preachers in the last sixteen years. I believe it a conservative estimate when I say that these fifty-three have added to the church twenty thousand souls. My apology for this statement is that I feel justified in the claim to be heard on the great question of supply of preachers.

F. D. Power, of the city of Washington, has said that most of our preachers must come from the country districts. That is true, and he could have added that most of them must come from the homes of the poor. The problem is to reach them and lure them into the work.

Perhaps the time will never come when the preacher's salary will draw great souls. The work itself must be made to appear so great and so honorable that great souls will be drawn to it regardless of money. I can think of no process by which a young man could be suddenly persuaded to enter the ministry, especially if he is as conscientious as he should be. But the process may be long, and surely leading toward the work, while the young man has no knowledge as to his leading.

The college is supposed to lead young men into the ministry. But a college education looks far off to many a poor young man, though he may have good stuff in him. This is a decidedly materialistic age. Young men are looking for something they call practical. A young man who is now in a state university told me ten days ago that four-fifths of the young men of that great school took up either mechanical or electrical engineering after finishing the preparatory work. These state universities claim to be the head of the public school system, and the high school graduates gravitate to the university.

As a people we are over a million strong. We need preachers badly. We have hundreds of congregations without leadership. How are we to get the preachers? Shall we say no man is fit to preach without a college education? If so, where are we to get the thousands we need who are to preach in small towns and country places for five hundred dollars a year? The problem is to be solved in our schools. In our commendable zeal for missions we have neglected the school, and hence we have not enough preachers. May I be excused if I draw conclusions from experience?

The fifty-three preachers of whom I have already spoken came here from homes of the poor. All but one, as far as I remember, came from the country. The great majority of them did not expect to preach. Most of them were not in the Christian Church. Most of them expected to be in but a short time—wanted to get ready to teach. The president of the school would say that is all right. Teaching is a great work, and if you can make a success teaching a country school, you can succeed at most anything.

These young men were made to feel that they were doing a great work, and one by one they got glimpses of greater work, and thus they were led on and on toward higher education and broader fields. A young man comes into my office and says: "I'm entering your school to take the classical course. Then I'm going to finish at Harvard, and finally, I'll finish up in Germany." As a rule I count that it will take this man about twenty weeks to finish his educational career. Comparatively few young men, especially of the poor, expect to finish a college course. When it is suggested to them they count it "very difficult if not impossible." It is not impossible, nor ought it to be very difficult.

The important question is, how to make it possible and comparatively easy. As I see it, the preparatory school is the means. What a young man, who has greatness in him most needs, is self-discovery.

That one thing will determine his career. When such discovery is made, you can not cheat him out of education if he is great in nature. Neither expense, nor length of courses will frighten him. I know a preacher who in the last twelve years has had from eight to ten thousand converts, who in securing education acted as janitor in a school, sweeping the floors, ringing bells and carrying wood up three flights of stairs. When he entered school he had a few dollars, but he did not see a college education ahead. He counted himself a very ordinary young man, and thought an ordinary education enough for him. At that time he was not a member of the Christian Church. But before long he discovered himself and the Book, and that determined everything.

What does the preparatory school have to do with this discovery?

I say everything. The university has comparatively nothing to do with it. The university assumes that the student has his habits and course of life largely determined, and the personal element enters not into the solution of the problem. To a young man who is not ready the university is a very dangerous place.

The preparatory school can adjust its schedule of prices and courses in such a balance as to be inviting to the young man who is both poor and ignorant.

I know a school, where are ten distinct departments of work, with prices for board, furnished room in private family and tuition running from $2.55 to $3 per week. Let the church build and support such schools and take a pride in them. Then we can get at the young men who are to be our preachers. Put into these schools

All Humors

Are impure matters which the skin, liver, kidneys and other organs can not take care of without help, there is such an accumulation of them.

They litter the whole system.

Pimples, boils, eczema and other eruptions, loss of appetite, that tired feeling, bilious turns, fits of indigestion, dull headaches and many other troubles are due to them.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Remove all humors, overcome all their effects, strengthen, tone and invigorate the whole system.

"I had salt rheum on my hands so that I could not work. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and it drove out the humor. I continued its use till the sores disappeared." Mrs. IRA O. BROWN, Rumford Falls, Me.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

able men, who are rich in education and sympathy.

Such men will be wise enough to treat students in a way to draw them out and toward self revelation. It is a mistake to urge by mouth every day, a college education. Make them feel like every day's work in school is a great day.

Let their education progress by the day and not by the year, and they will get a thirst for more.

Invite young men to come for a term of ten or twelve weeks.

Don't ask them to enlist for three years. Connected with such a school should be a Bible-school, not for higher work, but for beginners.

Young men should be taught the elements of the gospel, how to classify sermons and do pastoral work.

The aim of such a school should be the gathering in of a class of young men whom the college cannot reach, because of poverty and the length of a classical course. This would take in at times young married men who have limited education, but who desire to preach and who could preach if they had some training. We now could make use of a large number of men who have not a classical education. We need hundreds of earnest men to preach in our small towns and country places. I know of a place in Ohio where are eight congregations in a radius of fifteen miles with but one preacher. It will be a long time before we can supply such places with classical graduates.

By some it is feared that such schools would encourage looseness in education and defeat us in securing the best talent in the ministry. I answer that just such a school is the best means for discovering the best talent for the ministry. Such a school

Preachers Developed in Christian-Evangelist Office.

By Robert L. McHatton.

"The Christian" is responsible for several preachers—I think W. F. Richardson is one of its Illinois products. But my story will pertain to two others. It was not my purpose to be a minister. My boyish training did not point that way. My ancestry was Kentucky and southern blood, and while not sinful was quite worldly. Leaving Mississippi when but a boy, on account of sickness, I came ahead of the family to St. Louis. Home, money and everything gone save honor and pride. While a boy I was baptized by John A. Brooks in the First Christian Church, Seventeenth and Olive. I wish I had space to tell of B. S. Grant and my other Sunday-school teachers. I went as a charter member into the Central Church and received my highest esteem for the Christian ministry from my kinsman, D. Pat Henderson, but never thought of preaching.

In "The Christian" office I became very zealous for the plea of the Christian Churches and I have not outgrown my teaching. Brother Garrison was a fine preacher in those days and he is yet—only he has become cityfied. That sermon on "Life's Purpose, Plan and Prize," was grand. "Rightly Dividing the Word," was grander. Once in a while I would make a little talk. I read two little pieces I prepared at a little store house called the Gravois Mission. I had met a brother in the office and one day I hired a horse and rode to his home which was about twelve miles west of the city. His name was Daniel Booth.

We arranged to have a meeting the next Sunday in the Creve Cœur school house. Bro. Booth attended to the services and the Stevens girls led the music. I did the talking or rather the reading of the pages I had prepared. I do not call it a sermon, nor my maiden effort at preaching, but I know it was hard work and that the cold perspiration streamed down my back. The people spoke kindly to me and I went home and no one was told of my trip.

A short time after I secured Brother Henderson to preach in this house and he gathered the few brethren for miles and started a good, little church. It is gone to-day, but its work lives. I never felt such sermons, I never heard such a sweet voice and my soul was on fire for our plea and the Bible. Brother Garrison was to preach once a month. He held a short meeting and four or five converts were brought to the Central Church for baptism and one of these was Charley Young (now C. A. Young, editor of the Christian Century.) I saw him baptized and helped him in the robing room. He was a fine boy, good looking and bright. After thinking about the law, then teaching and then medicine, Charley became a preacher and he was a first-class one. He has done great good. I wish he would devote himself entirely to preaching the good, old gospel that Brother Garrison taught him. So I think "The Christian" gave us Charley Young and he was a good gift.

Now about myself. I had not been working in the office for some time. Saturday, Oct. 29, 1877, The General Christian Convention was in session in the Central Church. Brother Garrison had an appointment to preach Sunday in Walshville, Illinois. But he desired to remain in the city and sit at the Lord's table with his brethren from all parts of the Union. He wanted a substitute, but all the preachers enjoyed the same wish as Brother Garrison, and after failing to get a man to go he and Brother Brooks cornered me. The editor said, "Bob, I have never called on you in vain and now I am going to send you to Illinois to preach for me."

"Brother Garrison," I replied, "Don't make fun of me before these preachers."

Brother Brooks put in, "Robert you go and God go with you," and I returned, "All right, give me the money to pay my way and I will talk for Brother Garrison to-morrow." I rushed to my home and then to a late train. I cannot tell the emotions of my soul. A boy like me to fill the pulpit of the editor!

The train took me to a coal bank about a

DOCTORS ENDORSE SWAMP-ROOT

For Uric Acid, Kidney and Bladder Troubles.

A. J. HAILE, M. D.

East Atlanta, Ga., March 1st, 1901.

DR. KILMER & CO., Binghamton, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN:—While it has never been my habit or inclination to recommend remedies the in-redients of which are not all known to me it seems as if I should make an exception in the case of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root. My experience, so far as I have tested it in my practice, forces me to the conclusion that it is a remedy of the greatest value in all uric acid, kidney, liver, bladder and other inflammatory conditions of the genito-urinary tracts. I now take pleasure in prescribing Swamp-Root in all such cases with a feeling of assurance that my patients will derive great benefit from its use. I shall continue to prescribe it in other cases in my practice with the expectation of the best results. Very truly yours,

A. J. Haile M.D.

GENTLEMEN:—I have prescribed that wonderful remedy for kidney complaint, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, with most beneficial effect and know of many cures by its use. These patients had kidney trouble, as diagnosed by other physicians, and treated without benefit. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root effected a cure. I am a liberal man and accept a specific wherever I find it, in an accepted school or out of it. For desperate cases of kidney complaint under treatment with unsatisfactory results I turn to Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root with most flattering results. I shall continue to prescribe it and from personal observation state that Swamp-Root has great curative properties.

Truly yours,

276 9th St., Borough of Brooklyn, N. Y.

The mild and extraordinary effect of the world-famous kidney, liver and bladder remedy, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease, therefore, when through neglect or other causes, kidney trouble is permitted to continue, fatal results are sure to follow.

We often see a friend, a relative, or an acquaintance apparently well, but in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their severe illness, or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's Disease.

EDITORIAL NOTE—If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are getting better they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Sample Bottle of Swamp-Root Free by Mail.

You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful remedy, Swamp-Root, sent absolutely free by mail, also a book telling all about Swamp-Root and containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women who owe their good health, in fact their very lives, to the great curative properties of Swamp-Root. In writing to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., be sure to say you read this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

mile beyond the town of Hammond. I walked back to the depot. No man, no light, and so I sat on the steps to ponder my situation. Alone with God. How solemn and on such an errand. How shall I get to Walshville? In the distance I heard the rumbling of wheels, and it was music to my soul. The buggy is near and a voice shouts, "Hello, is Brother Garrison here?"

"Yes," I responded, walking to the conveyance. "Brother Garrison sent me to fill his place."

"Why, you look like you would rattle in his place." (I weighed 120). "Get in here."

The driver was Doctor Davenport and I told him my inexperience and after five miles ride he located me in the room over the front door. Well, who can measure my feelings. I put myself in His care and soon fell asleep. About daylight I heard a knocking at the front door and a stout voice asking, "Did Brother Garrison come last night?"

"No, but he sent a boy."

"There will be a great crowd to-day and it is too bad to have the people disappointed." The early visitor was Brother Jordan.

That was a great day for me. But I looked for help that has never failed me. Here is my sermon made from a prayer-meeting talk by Dr. Belding in the Central. Subject, "The Christian's Hope." For what does the Christian hope? 1. A good life here. 2. A peaceful death. 3. The resurrection of the body. 4. The heavenly home. I had a good amen corner. The good, old brethren even put their feet on the steps of the pulpit and cheered and prayed for me all the time. It was hard work, but it was a good meeting. News went everywhere that Brother Garrison had sent a boy and I went to church nearly an hour before meeting time in the evening to find every seat taken and soon the platform was full and many were standing. This time I gave them a talk on the "Glorious Gospel," getting my idea from Knowles Shaw. (I have revised that sermon and use it now). I think I did well—very well and almost filled Brother Garrison's place. My, how those people listened. It seemed as if they were helping me all the time.

After the benediction a young man stepped up to me and said, "I shall not delay longer. I want to be a Christian." I seated the crowd and took his confession. This was a supreme moment. The young man's name was Smith. The church paid me five dollars and I went on my way rejoicing. So I reckon "The Christian" had something to do with my being in the ministry.

News From Many Fields

Illinois.

This has been a cold winter for ramblers, but the good Father and his children are wondrous kind, and beget in us renewed gratitude daily.

Rushville Church was largely built up by D. E. Hughes, although others have materially added to its prosperity. C. B. Dabney, a graduate of Eureka College, is now the efficient minister. He not only preaches at Rushville, but has the care of weak churches near by upon his heart. He visits Bethany, the old mother church of the country, twice a month, Sunday P. M. This is one way to save the small church, but it is hard on the preacher. G. W. Ross does a similar thing for Ray near Vermont. This is most commendable.

Virginia has a splendid house of worship, and is ministered to by J. W. Carpenter, a graduate of Eureka College. He has just edited a fine Easter exercise for our benevolent association. This is the home of mother S. V. Savage, who has been a giver to Eureka College for 40 years. Had it not been for a few such friends, we would have no college now in our great state. What a blessed reward will come to her credit, from the influence of the hundreds of preachers, whose training was made possible by her generosity. Brother Carpenter also aids the Philadelphia Church, which has decreased seriously by removals and deaths. It is taking on new life.

Pleasant Plains, for three years, was the home of H. G. Waggoner, now at Allerton, Iowa. The people speak in kindest terms of him and his good wife. The present pastor, J. H. Henderson, is recently from the south, but he and his excellent family are patiently enduring the cold which is largely counteracted by the warm hearts of the people. We hope he will enjoy his new home, and find a welcome in our large field. This church remembers all our great enterprises in its offerings, which is one of the essentials to growth and prosperity. I believe many churches die of leanness. "The liberal soul shall be made fat." So of churches.

Ashland has just paid off the indebtedness on its good house of worship, and is happy. It has been the victim of bad men, from whose influences it has been hard to recover. Bro. C. E. Smoot, of Petersburg, is the preacher for the present, and he is bringing order out of chaos. It is a great loss to us that such valuable men cannot devote their whole time to the ministry.

Chandlerville has just secured the services of Bro. T. L. Young, who has made a good beginning. He too is from the south, educated at Kentucky University. This is the home of Dr. N. H. Boone, a liberal patron of Eureka College, and a tower of strength to the church. His nephew, Dr. H. B. Boone, a graduate of Eureka College, has a very fine practice, is a deacon in the church, president of the official board, and superintendent of the Sunday-school. Does it pay to send our boys to a Christian College? Or is it better to have infidel doctors, lawyers and teachers? This is one of the best churches in this part of the state, and is at this writing in a meeting with Bro. Guy B. Williamson and wife as singers.

Cantroll is the mother church of Sangamon Co. The elder England, organized a Baptist church about 1823, and some ten years later the term Baptist was dropped and it was ever after known simply as a church of Christ. The Englands, Brittons, Lakes, Canterbury's and Cantrolls are among the old prominent families, and the Clines, Lakes, Sales and Grants are newer additions. Bro. F. C. Overbaugh has been their minister for some seven months, and is well entrenched in the hearts of the people. Through his enterprise a course of lectures was provided for the people.

Athens is the church for which Bro. G. J. Ellis ministers. He is the compiler and author of the Praise Hymnal, in connection with Bro. J. H. Fillmore. He is a man of mature years, whose ministry is always a benediction to the church for which he ministers. He is a solid builder. A fine class of young people waits upon his preaching. This church is stronger than it knows. It is the home church of Sister Anna M. Hate, the valuable organizer and secretary of the C. W. B. M. of Illinois. The family is now under the shadows of a great affliction. May His grace sustain them.

Bro. J. M. Britton, of Springfield, a venerable and beloved disciple, has entered into his rest. He gave Eureka College $100 last fall. His offering will enter into the strength of our ministry and leaders and produce fruit many days hence. The memory of such men is blessed. Few of us appreciate the value of money in the kingdom of God. Yet many of us can do but little, except to provide money for the maintenance and growth of the church.

Eureka, Ill.

J. G. WAGGONER.

Northern California.

Changes are still the order of the day.

A. B. Markel left Eureka the first of February. Not sure whether they have secured his successor or not, but think they have.

W. T. Hunt has resigned at Fortuna to take effect May 1, and will seek a dryer climate. This is one of our best churches, in good works inferior to none.

H. C. Shrapshire has begun his labors with the Dinuba church and they hope to dedicate their new house in the near future.

G. E. Williams from Kahoka is on the ground at Butte City, and has entered upon his sacrificing labors.

D. Stewart has been called to Hanford and we bespeak for them a happy and prosperous relationship. This opens Tulare which is one of our good churches.

A. W. Bloom has left Bakersfield and the ministry. Bakersfield is a hard field, but we think when the right man is found it will come out O. K.

I think men will be called at both Tulare and Bakersfield by the time this is in print.

J. A. Halton, of Lexington, Ky., has been called to the College City church, and we look for him early in March.

F. L. Platt and D. W. Honn had a good meeting at Tulare in January with 31 added, 28 of them by confession and baptism.

A. L. Platt and D. W. Honn are now in a good meeting at Calusa and shaking that county seat; ten added the first week and house packed.

A. C. McKeever is assisting the little church at Sanger in a meeting.

The Hazelriggs are in a meeting at Napa, one of our good churches.

They had a good meeting at Stockton with 43 added in three weeks.

Gallahorn and Carroll are in a meeting at Galt, a dead church that we expect to revive. Brother Gallahorn has resigned as state evangelist, effective March 1. We shall continue to do what we can to open meetings for him. He has done an excellent work reviving dead churches in the past six months.

There is great room for a Christian philanthropist to do a good work in northern California. We need to bring our people coming from the east, together into communities where we can plant churches and have their assistance in evangelizing this great state. We need their help to keep from being overrun by the vast multitudes flocking to California. We need to assist them by securing good land and protecting them from the real estate shark. To do this calls for money. I have been pretty well over the state and know much about its soils. I want to turn this knowledge to account for the good of my brethren of this state and of the great cause we love; $25,000 to $100,000 is needed. Can make it pay a splendid return on the investment—who is the Christian brother willing to join me in this undertaking?

Los Angeles Letter.

January was a red letter month for the First Church. She inaugurated a mission work in the southwestern portion of the city, raised in cash and pledges money enough to insure the purchase of a pipe organ, and received at her regular services thirty members, mostly by letter, into fellowship in the one month. This church contributed the charter members and most of the money that erected the building for the Eighth Street Church, and gave nearly seventy members toward the charter membership of the Broadway Church. She now surrenders about sixty persons to constitute the membership of the Southwest Church. She will soon deserve the title of a mother of churches in the Angel City.

The mission organized Jan. 3, 1904, by the First Church in the southwestern part of the city, was organized into a separate congregation Feb. 14, and elected eight deacons. This congregation is worshipping in a hall admirably adapted to such a work. Jesse P. McKnight, recently of Oskaloosa, Iowa, has been called to the pastorate, and enters upon one of the most promising fields for work in southern California. It is hoped that a house may be built during the year, upon a lot purchased for this purpose some time since by the First Church.

The evangelistic fervor has struck this section. Jesse P. McKnight recently closed a splendid meeting with forty-five added at San Diego. H. E. Wilhite has just finished a campaign for the Glendora Church, L. O. Newcomer pastor, with fifty-four additions, mostly by conversion. Of this number, thirty-five were men. Meetings are now in progress at Covina, with George Rings, of Riverside, doing the preaching; at Hollywood, with R. P. Shepherd as evangelist; at East Los Angeles, with Jesse P. McKnight in the pulpit; and at Santa Paula, with the pastor C. R. Moore doing his own preaching. These meetings all promise well. Evangelistic fervor is rising in these parts.

The new church building at San Bernardino will be dedicated Feb. 28 with the writer in the pulpit at 11 a. m., and F. M. Dowling at 7:30 p. m. This building will be a distinct contribution to our good church buildings in southern California. Covina's new building will be ready for occupancy in the early spring. This is a fine structure.

Several new men have recently been added to our ministerial forces in sunny southern California. W. B. Taylor has just entered upon what promises to be a successful work at Santa Ana. J. I. Myers, from South Dakota, has accepted a call to minister to the Downey Church, which is one of the oldest congregations in this section. Jesse P. McKnight opens up a most auspicious work with the southwest church in Los Angeles. These brethren will be distinct contributions to our ministerial efficiency.

This winter has been remarkably dry in California. In Los Angeles the rainfall till Feb. 12 has been only one and a half inches. It usually is more than 10 inches to this date. Unless heavy rains fall very soon, this country will seriously suffer. The ministers and churches are unitedly praying for rain. This dry winter and cloudless days add to our climatic attractiveness for the multitudinous eastern tourists who flash hither every year. Many of these are regular attendants at our services. Others are unconscious of the fact that we have any churches on the golden slope.

Kentucky.

I. J. Spencer, of the Central Church, Lexington, has just returned from Kansas City, where he assisted W. F. Richardson in a splendid meeting, which closed with about 60 additions.

Pres. B. A. Jenkins, of Lexington, is giving a series of lectures this week at Paducah, on Bible themes.

Kentucky preachers seem to be in demand at the present time in California. M. D. Clubb, W. B. Taylor and W. F. Stafford have recently accepted calls to that state, and now the news comes that J. A. Holton, who recently resigned at New Union, Woodford Co., has accepted a call to the same state. Next!

B. N. Anderson, of Garrison, reports 25 additions in his work since October.

S. Boyd White, of Lexington, has accepted a call to Falmouth, succeeding W. S. Willis, who recently began work with the church at Millersburg.

F. M. Tinder, of Lancaster, recently assisted O. P. McMahan in a meeting at Somerset, which resulted in 22 additions—17 confessions and five by letter.

The many friends of M. A. Hart, who has been so ill at Fulton, Mo., rejoice to know that the report published in one of our papers of his death was a mistake, and that he is much improved. He is one of "our Kentucky boys," and has a host of friends in his native state.

The meeting at Rodburn, a few miles from Morehead, which was held by R. B. Neal, closed with 31 additions.

S. R. Hawkins, of Murray, has accepted the position of corresponding secretary of Indian Territory, and has already begun work in his new field. His headquarters will be at South McAlester.

E. L. Powell, of the First Church, Louisville, is now in a meeting with the Central Church, Des Moines.

George Darsie, of Frankfort; I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, and H. D. C. MacLachlan, of Shelbyville, are the Kentucky preachers who have places on the program of the Congress of the Disciples, which is to meet in Chicago, March 22-24.

J. J. Cole, who was located last year with the church at Campbellsville, has accepted calls for this year at Butler, Flower Creek and Grassy Creek, making his headquarters at Butler.

E. W. Elliott, of Eminence, is assisting R. M. Giddens in a meeting at Mayslick.

Chas. W. Barnes will divide his time this year equally between the Tolesboro and Orangeburg churches.

W. G. Walker, of Lexington, has succeeded J. T. Hawkins at Indian Creek, near Cynthia.

Texas.

Bro. T. J. Harris, pastor of the church at Martindale, recently organized a church whose members are all Mexicans. In this membership are two preachers who will preach regularly to the church. With Brother Harris to teach them the way of the Lord more perfectly, we shall hope for permanent good results from this church.

Bro. Ignacio Quintaro, our Mexican missionary in San Antonio, is doing a fine work, and building up his congregation both numerically and spiritually. The Sunday-school under his care is also doing well, and all departments of church work are prospering. Our national secretary, Bro. Benj. L. Smith, has made no mistake in standing by this Mexican work in San Antonio. Hundreds of these people are being taught the simple story of the cross through the preaching of Brother Quintaro, and these in turn carry the gospel to others. "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump."

With a similar mission to that of San Antonio, started in El Paso through Brother Martinez who recently came to us from the Methodists, a large portion of the Republic of Mexico might be reached within a few years with the plan of the Disciples. We shall hope that this mission will soon be established, and thereby give the Mexicans of El Paso an opportunity of accepting the simple gospel of Christ.

Bro. B. J. Waugh, who is pastor of the church at Beaumont, recently held a short meeting in Port Arthur, and established a church there. And if he can succeed in locating some consecrated minister of the gospel to labor with and for those people we can hope for a strong church there in the near future, but without which, the membership will soon become discouraged and the cause will wane, and the last state will be worse than the first. Who will go to Port Arthur and take that work? Write B. J. Waugh, Beaumont, Texas, or J. C. Mason, Cor. Sec., Dallas, Texas.

The church at Como is rejoicing over their new house of worship recently dedicated by Bro. M. M. Smith, evangelist of Dallas county district.

A new church house has recently been built at New Hope in Dallas Co., where we have not a large, but splendid membership who are alive to every good work. Bro. A. W. Lauder is the leading elder, and a good one too; in fact, he is a good preacher, but he will not let us call him by that name.

Bro. L. A. Dale, formerly of Abilene, has resigned his practice of law, and accepted the pastorate of the church at Big Springs, which we trust is a wise and permanent move, as he is too efficient in the pulpit to think of practicing law.

The program and arrangement committees of the great camp meetings to be held this year near San Marcos, Whitt, San Gabriel and Graford, are already at work to make these meetings a grand success. It is believed that at the camp meeting on the San Marcos river near the city of San Marcos, there will be the largest religious gathering ever witnessed in southern Texas. Preparations are being made for a great gathering of people, and in this we believe the committee will not be disappointed. June 24 is the day set for the beginning.

The great fire in Baltimore is second in the United States in extent and financial loss. The great Chicago fire being larger. The 2,400 houses burned were in the heart of the business section of Baltimore. While we sympathize with those who lost so much, we are thankful that all our church buildings are out of the fire area. The jewelry store of Bro. J. J. Jenkins, an officer in Brothers Ainslie's church, was burned, and no doubt others of our brethren were losers. The city is planning to leave out some narrow streets, widen others and erect a new, more sanitary business center. The great loss will result in a blessing.

F. D. Power is to lecture at Beaver Creek Feb. 22. Mrs. Power and Mrs. Bagby have both been ill. Work in southwest Washington is growing, and Thirtieth-fourth Street is going ahead.

J. T. Watson, our active minister at Vienna, Va., writes they will dedicate their new church May 29. This congregation was organized about five months ago.

The church at Ocean View, Del., where Jacob Walters ministers, has a member in Bethany College who is studying with the desire of becoming a missionary. She is Miss Myrtle Daisy, the first one baptized at our assembly at Bethany Beach. Also a young Brother Bennett from same church we understand has gone to Bethany to prepare for the ministry. Preparations have already begun for the program for Bethany Beach next summer. We hope to make this a great evangelizing and educational force in the east.

On Feb. 1 W. S. Hoye began preaching at Fairfield, Pa., continuing nine evenings, the writer leading the songs. There were already five Disciples here. Six made the good confession—a man and wife and three noble sons and a daughter—a whole household except a five-year-old child. The Methodists kindly allowed us the use of their house. Some others in the town were not so kind. We expect to have preaching there monthly, and they may erect a church soon.

From here I went to visit York, 50 miles further northeast. It is a manufacturing city of 40,000 people, and no church of Disciples of Christ there. Bro. J. R. Gaff, our minister at Jerusalem, Md., has his home there. I enjoyed their hospitality, and, in company with Brother Gaff, hunted up "scattered Disciples." Beside his wife and daughter here are Misses Daisy and Anna Waun, members at Jerusalem, Md., J. A. Compton and wife from Baltimore, Brother Horner and wife from Parkersburg, W. Va., and Sister Fannie M. Ering, formerly from New York State. There are no doubt others. Anyone knowing of Disciples in York please send me name and address.

One evening I attended a meeting of the Gospel Worker Society. W. B. Musselman, of Williamsport, Pa., a Menonite preacher, is the head of the society, and the workers are women. There is a department of men called the Gospel Herald Society, with headquarters at Philadelphia, Rev. C. B. Brunner president. The mission at York is carried on by four young ladies. They sing, pray, preach and take the collection. If they do not get enough the first time for their needs they go around again. They also do colportage work and sell their papers in saloons. They have a neat costume of navy blue. They make use of the mourner's bench and pray for the seekers, leaving them in the dark as to what to do to be saved, as many others who employ that method, but if their zeal and apparent spirituality, could be infused into some Disciples that are wanting in these, we could shake the world with the plea of our Master.

Reached our highest attendance at Sunday-school here last Lord's day. Have now 57 enrolled. Begin red and blue contest first of March.

A Human Life Line

If all the people who have been cured by Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine) were lined up in single file, two feet apart, the line beginning at Buffalo, would extend for miles and miles, far out toward the west. In this line would be found men, women and children, representing every vocation in life. Most of them were in bad shape physically when they began to take Vernal Palmettona. Some of them owe their very lives to it. If you were to talk to them, they would give full credit to this great tonic laxative remedy. Some of them went way on up into middle life, some of them even to old age, before they began taking our cure.

"If I had only taken Vernal Palmettona sooner," is the regret of many who realize that they might have been saved years of suffering. Do not let this be your experience. Indigestion, constipation, dyspepsia and all other diseases of the stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels are relieved quickly and eventually cured permanently by Vernal Palmettona. Only one dose a day does the work. It is done gently, yet thoroughly. This is in direct contrast to harsh purgatives and cathartics which are positively harmful. Many people are skeptical about a medicine with which they are unfamiliar. Maybe you are one of them. We don't blame you. It is common sense. We plainly print the guaranteed formula on every package of our remedy. Better still, we will send you postpaid a free sample. Try before you buy. ### JESUS CALMS THE STORM.— Mark 4:35-41.

Memory Verses 37-39.

Golden Text: He maketh the storm a calm so that the waves thereof are still.—Psalm 107:29.

Some of the material which is between the last lesson and the present one is far too important to be relegated to the obscurity of "connecting links." It is suggested that, especially in adult classes, the lesson be considered as including the three following groups of events:

1. The second preaching tour in Galilee, (Luke 7:1 to 8:3).

2. The day of teaching by warnings and parables at the Sea of Galilee (Mark 3:22 to 4:34).

3. The day of miracles by the sea. (Mark 4:35 to 5:43 and Matt. 9:27-34).

Friends and Enemies.

The Sermon on the Mount, with its unequivocal statement of the principles of the Kingdom and the conditions of discipleship, and ending with its clear-cut distinction between hearers and doers of the word, must have had the effect of drawing the line more sharply between the friends and enemies of Jesus. The scribes and Pharisees who had official dignities or personal pride to maintain through the perpetuation of the old religious formalism, ranged themselves at once on the side of his enemies. But the common people, attracted by his miracles of healing and by the convincing force of his teaching, remained his friends. More and more does Jesus now appear as an iconoclast, breaking down the old traditions and even disregarding what seemed to the formal Judaism of that day to be the essential proprieties. He praises the Gentile centurion as having more faith than could be found in Israel. He proved his Messiahship in answer to John the Baptist's query, by his works of mercy and by the fact that the gospel was preached to the poor. He rebuked the haughty Pharisee who had condescendingly invited him to dinner, and showed favor to an outcast woman who anointed his feet. He warned the self-righteous Pharisees that they were in danger of blaspheming against the Holy Ghost and incurring eternal damnation. He apparently repudiated his family ties and asserted that his closest kin were those who did the will of God. All of these things were odious to the official and priestly classes who thought of religion as being essentially the observance of the proprieties. Nevertheless, the common people heard him gladly.

Jesus' Method of Teaching.

Jesus was pre-eminently a teacher. The methods which he used were many. Five principal ones may be enumerated, of all of which we have already seen examples:

1. Discourse. In teaching in the synagogues he would most naturally adopt the lecture method which was suitable to that place. It is quite possible, however, that some of the recorded discourses, such as the Sermon on the Mount, are collections of sayings which were uttered at different times and places.

2. Dialogue. The Socratic method of question and answer was employed with telling effect as in the cases of the woman of Sychar and of the Pharisees who came trying to entrap him with subtle questions.

3. Parables. This method has the advantage of making truth self-evident. It relies upon no external authority but, by its very vividness and by the fact that it deals with familiar materials, it has the effect of a first-hand discovery of truth. The concreteness of parable teaching adapts it to child-like minds, and its story quality catches the attention of those who are not at first interested in the spiritual truth.

prove two things: his power and his love. His works of healing showed that he had divine power and hence, by implication, that his teaching had divine authority. The fact that these miracles were never wrought for his own comfort or convenience but always for the relief of the suffering of others, was a proof of the love of God.

5. Life. The success of Jesus as a teacher is not all accounted for when one had recorded what he said and what he did. The greatest educational force in the world is the contagion of a pure and perfect character. That was his in the highest possible degree and it would have made him a great teacher if he had never performed a miracle and had never uttered a parable or discourse.

The Parables of the Kingdom.

In this period of his ministry, Jesus is representing himself not merely as the saviour of individual men, but as the founder of the Kingdom into which men are to be brought, and through which they are to save others. Down by the lake-side one day, he uttered a group of wonderful parables embodying this thought of the kingdom. They are: the parable of the sower who sowed good seed upon hard, stony, thorny and good ground; the parable (or figure) of the candle and the candlestick; the parable of the growing corn; and the parable of the mustard seed (Mark 4:1-34). The distinctive feature of these is that they do not present the ideal of individual salvation—as the parable of the prodigal son does, for example—but they represent salvation as fruitfulness or helpfulness and as contributing to a more ultimate goal, which is the growth of the Kingdom of God.

The Stilling of the Storm.

On the evening of this day of parables, Jesus and the Twelve started to cross the Sea of Galilee in a little boat. A storm arose—one of those sudden and violent storms to which nearly every mountain-girt lake is subject. The little boat was in danger of sinking, and Jesus was asleep. As a tired man he needed rest. As a sensible man he wasted no strength in anxiety and outcry while the affair was in the hands of others. Even if Jesus had had no power over the waves, is it possible to conceive of him as distracted by a danger which he could not avert? His nerves were sound because his faith and his character were sound. It is a religious duty to be calm and to waste no vitality in useless anxiety. Jesus sleeping through a storm which, as a man, he could not control, is an example worthy of imitation.

The appeal of the disciples shows at once their faith and its limitations. They had a vague feeling that if he were awake he could do something to help them, but their faith was not equal to the task of leaving things entirely in his hands. That they did not expect the stilling of the storm is evident from their surprise when it occurred. They had already learned the power of Jesus over sickness and even over death, but they were not prepared to see inanimate nature obey him. They had feared the storm, and when it was calmed they could not but fear the Master of the storm.

Natural and Supernatural.

We do not know what force was invoked to stop the wind and still the waves—whether the mere fiat of the divine will, or some higher and still unknown force of nature to which only the divine intelligence had access. It is not necessary to suppose that any law of nature was broken in this miracle, or in any miracle. The laws of nature are the laws of God, and God has many laws which are as yet unknown to us, some of which perhaps always will be beyond the reach of finite intelligence. But when we remember that the chemical forces transcend the physical without breaking their laws, and that the vital forces transcend the chemical without breaking their laws, it ought not to be difficult even for one who believes in the uniformity of nature and the prevalence of natural law throughout the universe, to believe that God has other forces and laws, equally natural although unknown to men, by which the storm was stilled at a word and the dead raised at a touch.

THE LOST WORLD.

For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost.—Luke 19:10.

1. What was lost? Not the material earth, for it was then and is yet revolving in the way it was designed to revolve, and moving in its appointed orbit. Not the lower orders of beings which God had created, for these seem then as now to follow the law of their being and to fulfill their various purposes. It was man that was lost—the being created in the image of God. He alone seems to have violated the law of his being and was not fulfilling the purpose for which he was created.

2. What is it to be lost? The sheep was lost when it left the shepherd's fold and was wandering in the wilderness exposed to danger and without the shepherd's care. The piece of silver was lost when it was out of its proper place, and therefore of no use to its owner. We count any article lost that gets out of its proper place, so that we can not lay our hands on it when we want to use it. God regards man as lost when he gets out of his proper place and is not fulfilling the purpose of his being. Man's proper place is that of loving union with his Father, God, and obedience to him. It is in that relation to God alone that man can come to his best and be of greatest service to God and to humanity. But the whole world had broken union with God and was under sin, and hence under death, for "the wages of sin is death." It was, therefore, a lost world.

3. Who came to the rescue? Notice, it was the Son of man who came to seek and save the lost—a brother to the man that was lost. This would give him intense interest in the search, for it is his lost brothers he is seeking. It would also give lost men interest in their rescuer, because he is their brother. Jesus Christ was "found in fashion as a man" because in that way he could get closer to humanity.

4. How did Jesus propose to save the world? First, by giving his life for it, in order to reveal God's love for man and his hatred for sin, and then rising from the dead to carry forward the work of bringing men to God. This good news of his death for our sins, of God's love for us, of his triumph over death, and his offer of pardon to all who will come to him is called the gospel. Now, in the second place, he established his church to carry this gospel to all the world because all were lost. The plan—Christ's plan—is to have every one who believes on him to work with him in bringing others to believe on him. In other words, the church exists to help Christ in seeking and saving the lost. It has been very neglectful of this great duty in the past, but in the last hundred years it has been waking up to this great work, with glorious results.

5. The March offering. The first Lord's day in March has been set apart for many years as the time for the churches and all individual believers to make an offering to send the gospel to all the world. The effort this year is to raise $250,000. If every member of this and every other church will do its duty next Lord's day, this sum will be easily raised. Let us have special prayers to-night that God's love for us as shown in Christ's death in our behalf may touch our hearts and stir us up to greater zeal in this work.

Prayer: Almighty God, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we thank thee that thou didst so love the world that when it was lost thou didst give thy Son to save it, and that thou didst in him come to seek and save the lost. We rejoice to be among those who have been found and have been brought to know thee and thy love. Oh grant us grace to help bring others to the knowledge of this great salvation for his sake who loved us and gave himself for us! Amen.

March 6.HOW CHRIST STILL THE STORMS OF LIFE.—Psalm 107:23-31.For the Leader.*

There is something in a great storm that makes us feel our littleness. When the trees are blown away as if they had been dead weeds; when houses are picked up as a child would gather his toys; when the vivid lightning flashes across the sky; when the deep peals of thunder roll out in advance of the roaring of the storm, and the windows are darkened and tremble, we get a lesson in human weakness and frailty. It may be hard to tell just how it comes and whither it goes, but we are sure we have the lesson. There comes with it a lesson in the power of the Infinite who rules in the storm. But those who have gone to sea and have experienced the storm of the mighty deep, tell us that more sublime is the sight and more lasting the impression. The Psalmist says they "see the works of the Lord, and his works in the deep." But these are not mere real, nor more interesting than storms that beat upon His children while they pass through this land where every soul is tried, and where not a single ship is permitted to enter port save through the storm. How does Christ still these storms for us? Is the question we ask ourselves to-night.

For the Members.

1. One time when Jesus and his disciples were crossing the Sea of Galilee Jesus was resting in the end of the boat and fell asleep. A storm arose. The disciples rowed harder as the storm became more intense. It grew more threatening. Then they rowed still harder to bring the boat to land, but all of them combined could not make headway against the storm. Then they thought of the Master sleeping in the boat. They awoke him, asking him to help. He looked at the fury of the storm. The waves were rolling like mountains. What human arm could hold the oar against such strength? None. He said, "Peace, be still," and the storm was abated at once.

2. Do we not often, like the disciples of the Lord, battle alone or in our own strength, against the storms of life? Yes, we do. And we are beaten against the rocks. The strength of opposition is too much for us. The waves mount up to the sky. We go down as into the grave. Our hearts are bruised. We wonder when help will come. The night is long and dark; the day is full of danger and trouble. Why do we not ask the Savior to help us? We need not wait and wonder. He is near; only ask Him. In the nature of things he can not help us unless we want him to do so, unless we call upon him. While he can exercise all power over nature, and while he can supply all our needs when we call, he can not save a soul without co-operation. If we will but think a moment about what salvation really is, we will see that this is true.

3. The person who lives out of Christ is cut off from the great source of help. Let him pride himself in the dignity of man. Let him praise the powers of the human will. Let him say many good things of the determination that wants to do all it can for itself. That is all right. But let him have whatever philosophy he will about it, the storms that beat upon him will bring all his hopes to the ground and blow away the last vestige of shelter from over his defenseless head. He should bring his troubles to Jesus. He should learn that he can not bear them alone. If he is not a Christian, to whom can he call for help out of the darkness and storm of the night of human weakness and sin? It takes all a man can do for himself and all his Savior can do for him to save him. Christ stills the storms of life for us by giving us peace of mind; by leading us in the quiet way; by giving us strength to overcome temptation; by giving us fortitude to hold out; by furnishing us the comforts and blessings of the communion and the fellowship of his church. He can only do this for us when we commit our ways to him. When we give the ship over to him, he will be responsible for its safe arrival in port.

Quiet Hour Thought.

Do we believe that Christ is able to still the storms of life, and are we willing to entrust it all to him?

Our Budget

—The March offering is the annual fruitage of the churches in the department of world-wide missions.

—Whoever causes two churches to participate in this offering where only one participated before, is a benefactor of his race.

—The CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST solicits all the news everywhere, relating to the progress of Christ's kingdom, or the movements of any part of the king's army. Every triumph of truth and righteousness, in every community, will encourage others to fight with courage the enemies of God and man.

—Have you raised that club yet in your church for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST? If not, you are not joining in the crusade for ten thousand new subscribers as many others are. Now is a much better time than later on in the year. Report to our superintendent, G. A. Hoffman, if you are raising a club, or write him for particulars if you need further information.

—It is our western civilization, the product of Christianity, that has prepared Japan to resist the aggressions of one of the most autocratic and persecuting powers of the world.

—The religion of Jesus Christ is the only power that can rightly solve "the Eastern question," and cause the Oriental nations to face the future and seek their golden age there rather than in the past.

—Last week the Foreign Society received $500 from a friend in Arkansas on the annuity plan; also a thousand dollars from a friend in Ohio on the same plan.

—Let nothing interfere with the March offering. If you have a debt, a generous offering for missions in foreign lands will help to give the church strength and purpose to cancel it. If you have a meeting on hand, an effort to save the needy abroad will give your church purpose and interest to save sinners at home.

—The last and most important command of our Lord was "Go!" It is as binding upon us as upon the disciples who received it fresh from the lips of the risen Christ. Nineteen centuries have not weakened the imperative force of that command. This towers high above all others; it includes all others. The church that trifles with this last command of our reigning Lord does so at its peril.

—B. F. Cato, who has been at Thorntown, Ind., has accepted a unanimous call to the Central Church at New Albany, Ind.

—R. A. Omer, Camp Point, Ill., evangelist, and Lorenzo D. Spragte, singer, are with R. A. Hunt, Savannah, Mo., in a meeting.

—H. T. Morrison, who was recently recalled from his work at Dayton, Wash., by the death of his wife, will remain in Springfield, Ill., indefinitely. His correspondents will take notice.

—J. P. Davis, of Golden City, Mo., will supply the pulpit at Trinidad, Colo., while the pastor, David C. Peters, is abroad. Brother Peters will sail from Boston on March 12 for Alexandria, Egypt.

—The new church at San Bernardino, Cal., where J. R. Shie is minister, will be dedicated Feb. 28. The morning sermon will be preached by A. C. Smither, of Los Angeles, and the evening sermon by S. M. Dowling, of Pasadena.

—At Moline, Kan., the ladies' aid society gave a reception to the new members of the church. The Endeavor Society has been re-organized with an enlarged membership, and the Bible-school is the best in the town. E. L. Poston is pastor.

—Thos. J. Easterwood, of Theo, Texas, is advocating what he calls the New Testament Reading Circle, which is composed of persons who will promise to read the New Testament through at least once within a year. He asks all persons who will agree to do this to send their names to him.

—Mr. and Mrs. Stutzman celebrated their fiftieth anniversary on Jan. 26. Both of them have been members of the Christian Church for more than half a century, and they boast that they have received and read every issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since it began publication. We hope they may long continue in this fellowship.

—A. T. Hall, Atwood, Kan., writes: "I have closed my ministerial labors on account of old age and poor health, lacking but a few days of eighty years. I have spent fifty-three years in the service. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST gives me such reading matter as no other paper can furnish."

—P. S. Hillman, pastor at Clinton, Mo., writes that on Sunday, Feb. 14, the church there raised $1,150, which is more than enough to liquidate the mortgage on the building. F. O. Fannon was present and assisted in the work. Brother Hillman has resigned, to take effect March 1, and is open for an engagement to hold a meeting.

—Our Missouri readers should bear in mind the Missouri Church Lectureship which will be held at Fulton, April 11 to 14. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., will give two lectures. Other addresses will be by W. J. Lhamon, W. T. Moore, D. R. Dungan, Levi Marshall, F. N. Calvin, L. S. Cupp, F. G. Tyrrell, R. G. Frank and B. T. Wharton. The program is a splendid one and the lectureship should be largely attended.

—The Florida State Convention will be held in Tampa March 22-24. The corresponding secretary, C. W. Zaring, writes that all brethren visiting in the state at that time will be cordially welcomed. It is expected this will be the best convention ever held in Florida, and the influence of the convention will be a great uplift to the cause in Tampa.

—It was a remarkable meeting that has recently closed at East Galesburg, Ill. Almost a hundred additions in a village of 700, under the preaching of J. T. Stivers, of Knoxville. That means real spiritual power. All the great meetings are not held in the cities. Read the report of this meeting elsewhere under the head. "A Great Meeting in a Village."

—Remember the Congress of the Disciples of Christ. It meets in Chicago March 22-24. The meetings will probably be held in the magnificent new assembly hall of the University of Chicago, and the occasion will afford opportunity not only for hearing some splendid addresses and participating in the discussions, but for visiting the University and seeing something of the Disciples' Divinity house.

—R. L. Wilson, for past two years pastor at Harvey, Ill., has been extended a call by the newly organized mission at South Chicago. This is a very important center of over 70,000 people. He has not yet determined to accept, though indications point that way. This new field is under the supervision of the Chicago Mission Society and I. C. M. S., and now has a membership of about 30, and a Sunday-school of 55, and very promising.

—The church at Nevada, Mo., is now free from debt. Three years ago when G. D. Edwards became pastor, there was an indebtedness of about $17,000 including accumulated interest. Within a year $10,000 had been raised and paid, and most of the balance was provided for by a loan of $5,000 from the Church Extension fund, to be repaid in five annual installments. The pastor was not contented to let this loan run its natural course, but has so strengthened and aroused the church that it has now paid off the entire indebtedness.

—Hugh T. H. Miller, of Columbus, Ind., is a candidate, according to the Indiana paper, for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor of that state. Mr. Miller is one of elders of the Tabernacle Church in Columbus, and is now a member of the Indiana Legislature. He is a son-in-law of Z. T. Sweeney, and a son of the late John C. Miller, one of the Indiana's pioneer preachers and educators. He was until recently a professor in Butler College, as his father—a Bethany graduate—was before him. Mr. Miller is widely and favorably known throughout the state, both in educational and church circles, and has in recent years gained an honorable reputation in the field of politics.

—The church at Hot Springs, Ark., wants to borrow a tent. J. V. Updike is to be with them for a five weeks' meeting beginning the fourth Lord's day in April, and they have been unable to secure a place in which to hold the services. As our readers are well aware, it takes a big auditorium to hold an Updike meeting. The cause at Hot Springs is at a turning point, and very much will depend upon the outcome of this revival. Bro. T. N. Kincaid, the pastor, has been working there against odds for several years, and the time is ripe now for a real revival. If any church, state board, or evangelist having a tent which will hold at least 450 people (the larger the better) will lend it to the Hot Springs church, it will be doing a good work. The church will pay the freight. Address T. N. Kincaid, Hot Springs, Ark.

A cordial invitation is extended to all Disciples of Christ by the Hyde Park Church, the First Church and the Englewood Church to be present at the Congress. Every effort will be made to provide entertainment for all who come. The homes that are opened freely to the visitors will provide lodging and, breakfast; other meals can be obtained readily in the restaurants and hotels. The splendid cafe and dining hall for men of the University of Chicago, will be thrown open to the delegates to the Congress where regular meals can be obtained for twenty-five cents each. There are many other restaurants and cafes in the neighborhood but none so convenient and elegantly appointed as at the University.

The Hyde Park Church can be reached from the down-town district in three ways. First, by the Cottage Grove Cable line which may be taken on Wabash Ave., taking the Jackson Park cars and getting off at Lexington and 55th St. This is the most direct and the nearest way, but not the quickest.

Second, by taking the suburban trains on the Illinois Central at either Randolph St., or Vanburen St., and the Lake, and getting off at the 57th St., Station and walking seven blocks west.

Third, by taking the South Side Rapid Transit on the Elevated railroad and getting off at Lexington Ave., and 63rd St., and walking north about seven blocks across Midway Plaisance.

For those coming into the city over the Illinois Central, the Michigan Central, the Big Four, get off at the 53rd St. Station (or Hyde Park) go west to Lexington Ave., and south to 57th St. For those coming in over the Rock Island system, the Pennsylvania lines, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Wabash, the Monon, the Chicago and Eastern Illinois, the Erie, get off at the 63rd St. Station (Englewood) and take the 63rd Street car east to Cottage Grove, change and go to 55th St., change and get off at Lexington Ave. This will save the time, of running into the city and back again on the street cars.

All letters should be addressed to,

E. W. Bowers, who has been pastor of the First Christian Church, Springfield, Mo., for four years, wishes to change his location this spring and is open for an engagement as pastor. Address 469 E. Elm St., Springfield, Mo.

Lorenzo D. Sprague is open for engagement as evangelistic singer for a meeting in March. He is well qualified to do good service. Address for the present, Savannah, Mo.

C. M. Hughes, 114 W. 4th St., Mansfield, O., will be open for engagement as evangelistic singer as soon as the meeting in which he is now engaged at Mansfield, is concluded.

G. E. Shanklin, now at Lamont, Mo., expects to move to Marshall, Mo., about April 1. Churches within a radius of 100 miles of Marshall desiring a pastor may address him at Lamont.

W. H. Alford, who is now in a meeting at Kansas City with Clinton Aber, and after that will hold one at Clayton, Ind., with J. Wallace Tapp, of Ladoga, will be open for engagements after March 15. He is especially desirous to hold a few meetings in the south during the summer. In response to numerous calls Brother Alford resigned the pastorate at Scottsburg, Ind., to engage permanently in evangelistic work. Address him at Ladoga, Ind.

Missionary Notes.

If the churches as churches give $100,000 the first Sunday in March, the quarter of a million dollars will probably be raised this year. This is about $20,000 more than they gave last year. The churches are stronger and no doubt appreciate the work more than one year ago.

The March offering should be mentioned in every church on every Sunday during the month of February.

The Foreign Society requests all the churches to hold a foreign missionary rally Sunday night, Feb. 21, as an immediate preparation for the offering.

R. F. Thrapp, of Jacksonville, Ill., says: "For every dollar we give to convert the heathen abroad, God gives us ten dollars' worth of purpose to deal with the heathen at home."

It will be well for the churches to secure the necessary March offering supplies at once and begin a general and systematic preparation for March 6.

The idea of the Living Link Church, a church supporting its own missionary, is an inspiring one. It means, too, that while the missionary is supported on the one side, that Christ, the living Lord, is the source of life on the other. May the time soon come when not only hundreds of churches, but hundreds of individual persons as well, shall be living links—or, in other words, living branches, abiding in the living Vine on the one hand, and on the other hand bearing rich and abundant fruits throughout the heathen world.

The Foreign Society has just sent to all the churches their annual apportionment for foreign missions. These apportionments are only suggestive. In the main they are the minimum of what the churches are abundantly able to give for the preaching of the gospel to every creature. No doubt the churches will carefully consider these apportionments and do all in their power to secure them.

F. D. Power says, "A Quarter of a Million for Foreign Missions by all means. We have only been laying foundations. Now for the glory of the superstructure. Forward is the word."

The Foreign Society requests all our churches to hold a Foreign Missionary Rally Sunday evening, February 21. Such a rally can be made very serviceable. We commend it.

We should remind ourselves that a lack of the missionary spirit in our churches will prove the death of the special plea we make as a people.

If we raise a quarter of a million dollars for Foreign Missions this year, each church must take special pains to reach its apportionment.

There is much to encourage us in our foreign work. During the past ten years there

To Missouri Disciples.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: Permit me a little space, as President of the State Board of Missouri, to report to the brethren of our great commonwealth. First, I rejoice to say, our beloved corresponding secretary, Brother Abbott, is better, and seems now on the way to recovery from what threatened to be a very serious and prolonged illness. But it will be some time before he is able to resume his work in full. Hence we ask the forbearance of his correspondents until he is able to make fit reply. His trouble comes directly from overwork, in seeking to secure from our churches throughout the state the means to carry on the work committed to the hands of our board. He has worked night and day, and yet has seen our treasury remain depleted, and the possibility facing us of having to call some of the workers from their fields. The best medicine that can be administered to him is for our preachers and churches to rally to our state work, and send in their apportionments. Not for his sake alone, but for that of the needy places, and the loving Lord who would supply their need through us, we plead for a prompt and generous response to this appeal. Brethren, send in the apportionments from your churches, and the work of God will go grandly forward in our great state.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

Correspondence

Good News from Japan.

George Sidney Phelps was a member of the South Broadway Christian Church in Denver. He is now engaged in Christian Association work in Japan. The following was written by him in Kyoto, Japan, Dec. 7, 1903. It is a message of gladness from the Sunrise Kingdom. The hundred thousand readers of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, I am sure, will enjoy reading what follows:

"To-day we are one-year-old Japanese. We landed in Yokohama a year ago. A few weeks ago a man landed in Kobe from America, having been brought to Japan to serve as a teacher in one of the government schools. When he reached Japan he was about the bluest person one could imagine. He was ready to return by the next boat. He was blaming himself for having been such a fool as to leave his native heath. One of his first questions was, 'Are there any Christians in Japan?' To his rather amazed listener he explained that while coming over on the boat, two men had told him that missionary work was a failure, that the missionaries were socially ostracised by the Japanese, that they did no work anyway, but lazed about, many of them engaged in money-making ventures and, to crown all, they proclaimed that there was not a prominent Christian in Japan! As one of these informers purported to have been a teacher in the Imperial University for years, and as the other had spent several years in the Far East, their words had taken such effect on our friend that he was nearly sick over the prospect which confronted him.

"Before I use this incident for my text, let me say that one of those anti missionary gentleman came directly to a missionary's home where he remained several weeks, led a prayer-meeting, made a present of money to a missionary enterprise, and was generally very voluble in his expressions of love for 'those dear old heroes of the cross,' to quote his own words. And since such remarks as were dinged into this young man's ears are current coin along the routes traveled by tourists, most of whom never take the pains to investigate the facts of the case, let me present a few facts of my own:"

"On the fourteenth of February, 1903, a committee of thirty-two Japanese was chosen to consider plans for organizing a city association. After months of careful and thorough work, this committee submitted a constitution which was adopted and used as the basis of organization on the nineteenth of October. This document, for simplicity, comprehensiveness and association orthodoxy would do credit to any association in America. A little later, a board of directors, twelve in number, being chosen, it immediately elected its officers and proceeded to solve the problems of the new association. Here again I frankly say that I think there are few boards of directors of new associations in America which would contain so many representative men or so many who quickly grasped the fundamental principles of the movement.

"Let us proceed, however, to answer our friend's question as to whether there are any Christians in Japan. Every one of the eleven Japanese on this board is a member of an evangelical church. As for their standing, the president is the principal of the Episcopalian Girl's School; the vice-president is a physician who graduated from Edinburgh University; the treasurer is vice-president of a railroad, an ex-member of the Imperial Diet, and now one of the most influential men in Kyoto. Other members include the leading physician of Kyoto, highly connected socially, a Johns-Hopkins graduate; a major of the army; a leading dentist; a professor in the government college; two professors in the Doshisha, and two merchants. One of these is an influential member of the city council, owner of the electric street railway and leader in the Chamber of Commerce. This gentleman has shown great interest in planning for a new building. In a recent interview he expressed himself like this: 'Christianity has been railroaded long enough. It is time that Kyoto had a wholesale plant.'

"We are devoutly thankful for answer to prayers for a Japanese secretary. We have secured Mr. Yoshizaki, up to this time a professor in a Methodist college in Nagasaki. Mr. Yoshizaki is a graduate of the University of the Pacific. He also spent one year in the Northwestern University, and another in the University of Chicago, where he received the degree of Master of Arts. He is a fine Bible teacher. His work in Kyoto will begin January first.

"One new Student Association has been organized. It is in the Government Higher Commercial Schools where there are seven hundred students. The new association has forty members. There are two Bible classes. The other Student Associations in Kyoto are prosperous. Another will probably be organized this year.

"I have a Bible class of twenty-eight Governmental College students which is a delight to me. A class of about twenty Normal students meets at our house every Sunday morning at eight o'clock. These boys come two miles to attend this class, although not one is a Christian."

The reading of the foregoing in our mid-week meeting caused great joy among us, especially, the acquaintances of "Sidney"—as they call him. The South Broadway Church is proud of its representative in Japan. Kyoto, often spelled Kioto, is the third city in Japan in population. It is the center of Japanese Buddhism. It is a city of art and pleasure, a center of refinement. It is the seat of one of the fine higher middle schools, and the headquarters of the mission work in Japan of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. It is a fact of no minor importance that the Christian religion is getting such a strong hold in a city of this character with a population of a quarter of a million.

"Are there any Christians in Japan?"
Denver, Colo. B. B. TYLER.

A Great Meeting in a Village.

We have just closed a most successful meeting at East Galesburg, Ill. In twenty-eight days 92 members were added to the church; 78 baptisms. When we take into consideration the size of the building, which would not seat over 250 people, and a village having a population of less than 700, we consider it a marvelous victory for primitive Christianity. About six months ago we secured the services of Brother Stivers, who has done a great work at Knoxville, to hold us a meeting to begin Jan. 24. For four weeks our little house was packed to the doors every night. The interest never lagged. The last evening there were nine additions, eight of these being confessions. Brother Stivers deals with no side issues, but brings a man face to face with his God. He has the faculty of converting men who have reached middle life and old age. His whole heart is in his work and the people are eager to hear him. One feature was the query box, which he conducted with great success. Our after meetings were precious indeed.

Our singing was conducted by a chorus of about twenty voices, led by Clinton Sealock, of Golcen, who was with us a part of the time.

Fifty years of success. The simplest and best remedy for Coughs and Throat Troubles. In boxes only.

Avoid Imitations.

John S. Brown

Miss Dola Reiter also rendered us many beautiful solos. Of the 92 additions only 15 are children. The remainder are adults, and of these 39 are men, 22 being heads of families. Our new converts went right to work and were successful in bringing many of their friends to Christ. One young man who conducts a restaurant tore out his slot machine, and said he was going to be a Christian out and out. Many of the young men during the day gathered in a room downtown where they read and talked over their Bibles. Never was a town more thoroughly converted. There are many homes with new Bibles in them which are being read every day.

Much credit is due our faithful pastor, B. H. Sealock, who has served us half time for nearly a year. He has done a great preparatory work here and the field was ripe unto the harvest.

Heretofore we have only had preaching half time, but on the third Sunday of our revival Brother Stivers announced that we were now strong enough to have preaching all of the time. We raised over $800 in subscriptions and our greatly esteemed pastor, B. H. Sealock, who graduates in June at Eureka, is called for all his time.

A year ago we were a little, weak, struggling band of 24. Five only being men. We were too poor to have preaching, only once in a while, and were much discouraged. The church at Abingdon sent their beloved pastor, D. J. Elsea, to hold us a revival, and he is really the leader in this great victory. There were 36 additions in that meeting. In one year a little band of 24, struggling and disheartened, has increased into a strong and influential church of 152. Surely this is one of the greatest meetings.

MRS. E. G. HOWARD.

Dedication at Leon, Iowa.

Our new church, recently completed at a cost of about $9,000, was dedicated to the Lord yesterday, Feb. 14, amid great enthusiasm and rejoicing. Dr. L. L. Carpenter, whom we had planned to have present to do the work, failed us at the last moment on account of sickness. We called Bro. J. A. McKenzie, of Grant City, Mo., who is here in a meeting, to the front at the eleventh hour, who preached a fine dedicatory sermon, then raised $3,500, which put us out of debt and on our feet again.

Brother McKenzie shows a number of good signs which would indicate a first class dedicatory. The Methodist and Presbyterian organizations joined us in these dedicatory services. General good feeling prevailed and all enjoyed the occasion most heartily.

We are not forgetful nor do we fail to appreciate the efforts put forth by our pastor, H. H. Hubbell, in the erection of this house. This is an improvement we have needed for a number of years, and it has been within our reach all this time, but being so near the Missouri line we just needed "to be shown" a little, and Bro. H. has well and faithfully directed the work. Everybody is feeling happy to day, and we can with the true spirit sing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

A Wonderful Medicine.

If you read this paper you know about Drake's Palmetto Wine for the Stomach, Flatulency and Constipation. We continually praise it, as hundreds of our readers do. Any reader of this can have a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine free by sending a letter or postal card to Drake Formula Company, Drake Building, Chicago, Ill.

One dose a day of this tonic, laxative Palmetto medicine gives immediate relief and often cures it a few days. Drake's Palmetto Wine is a wonder worker for Blood, Liver and Kidneys.

Seventy-five cents at Drug Stores for a large bottle, usual dollar size, but a trial bottle will be sent free and prepaid to every reader of this paper who writes for it.

The Religious Education Association.

This association was organized in Chicago last year. Its second annual meeting will be held in Philadelphia, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, March 2, 3, 4, 1904. The meetings will be held in the First Baptist Church—Ken B. Tupper, D. D., pastor. The program promises a most interesting meeting. The following general topics will be discussed: "The Bible in Religious experience;" "The Bible in Education;" "The Bible in Social and Civic Life;" "The Present Status of Bible Study in the Theological Curriculum;" "How Shall the Theological Student be Taught to Use the Bible?" "The Minister and the Bible;" "The Churches and the Bible." "The Betterment of the Sunday-School" will be considered. One of the questions to be discussed under this heading will be, "What Can the Religious Education Association Do During the Next Year for the Betterment of the Sunday-School?" "The Bible in the Public Schools" will come up for consideration. "The Present Status of Religious Education in the Young Men's Christian Association will be brought out. One of the most interesting topics will be the "Present Conditions and Influence of the Press Upon Religious and Moral Education."

There is not space to record the names of the many distinguished persons who will read papers and deliver addresses. This promises to be a great convention—not so much in the numbers in attendance, as in character.

Those who expect to attend will do well to address the Rev. C. R. Blachall, D. D., Room 419 Crozer Building, Philadelphia, Pa., that they may secure low rates for entertainment in hotels and boarding houses.

A rate of a fare and one-third on the certificate plan is being arranged for on all railroads.

A Preaching Tour in China.

When Dr. Elliott I. Osgood went to China in the employ of the F. C. M. S., he left the pastorate of the country church in Stow, O. He wrote to one of the members here Jan. 9, 1904:

"There are many in this region now professing Christ who knew him not when we came to Chu Cheo. There are a number in the Chu Cheo Christian graveyard who died in the faith during these five years. God be praised for these many marks of his constant presence with us!

"This fall I have been traversing the region west of here, where there are several who are inquiring the 'way' and studying to see if these things are so. Not long ago I spent a Sunday there and in two farm houses congregations came together to hear the word. They are so different from those we see in the market towns. In a nearby market town, which consists of a street not more than two quarters of a mile long, there are no less than 20 opium dens. You can imagine what sort of jaundiced, thin faced, sloppy dressed fellows those shopkeepers and so-called cultivated teachers are. These farmers are on the contrary strong, hardy, and way above the average Chinese in straightforwardness. They are exceedingly hospitable. As I passed one home the old lady came out and persisted that we must come in and take tea with her. Their homes are much more cleanly than those in the towns. Since I was there this old lady's husband was taken suddenly sick and died. They will have the burning of incense and candles, the incantations of the priests, the burning of paper in imitation of money, and all the other rites. I trust that when she dies she will have a Christian burial, as also her son; for they are inquirers. The men and women in that region remind me much of Stow, as they are both very hospitable and also very great lovers of their homes.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

Mrs. Robert Caldwell, president of Excelsior Springs writes, "We want our apportionment raised to $15, and hope we can do more." They were asked for $10.

Two auxiliaries have written their apportionments are too large, and have pledged smaller amounts, and another in a college town feels that to support the two orphans it has adopted is all they can do in specials, as every effort is being made by all to free the college of debt. These three leave a deficit in special work of $80. Are there not other auxiliaries who can increase their apportionment or pledge to make up for the deficit? Excelsior Springs is good for the $5. Holiday for $8. This leaves only $67, deficit, so far as heard from. Who else will help with an advance? The quarterly letters which will soon reach you are very important. They call upon executive committees to plan for the best and most efficient ways to reach the auxiliary membership with the 5 cents a month state dues. The national convention will call for a vote in October from state officers as to whether or not the payment of state dues shall be embodied in the auxiliary convention. Your state officers must vote as you instruct them.

Each auxiliary has an opportunity to cast a vote "for" or "against" it at its March meeting. Only these states were not ready to vote "yes" last October. The matter was laid over for a whole year, to give these states time to find out whether or not they are ready to take a step forward. Are we? Of course we are. I feel sure our sisters will never ask their officers to go before the representatives of all the states and say for them, "we are not ready, we will walk in the old way for awhile longer."

I am sending to some of the auxiliaries a leaflet on an important matter. I trust it will be studied most thoroughly at executive meetings.

A Month in Missouri.

Columbia is an educational and ecclesiastical center, of which any state or people can well be proud. In some respects, perhaps in most, the apparatus cannot be excelled. The personnel is of the highest and the general tone, morally and religiously in particular, is admirable. The Disciples of Christ can make no mistake in concentrating their loyalty and affection upon such places, and the position occupied by them in this Athens of Missouri is a glorious tribute to the wisdom and consecration of more than one generation of devoted souls. The Bible College has the promise and potency of unexampled usefulness and is designed and calculated for leadership in the spread of a sane and salutary Christianity; so much needed by the churches, so much wanted by the world. Christological rather than theological; evangelical rather than ecclesiastical; moral rather than mechanical. No other brand can live long, or if it

WHAT SULPHUR DOES

For the Human Body in Health and Disease.

The mention of sulphur will recall to many of us the early days when our mothers and grandmothers gave us our daily dose of sulphur and molasses every spring and fall.

It was the universal spring and fall "blood purifier," tonic and cure-all, and mind you, this old-fashioned remedy was not without merit.

The idea was good, but the remedy was crude and unpalatable, and a large quantity had to be taken to get any effect.

Nowadays we get all the beneficial effects of sulphur in a palatable, concentrated form, so that a single grain is far more effective than a tablespoonful of the crude sulphur.

In recent years, research and experiment have proven that the best sulphur for medicinal use is that obtained from Calcium (Calcium Sulphide) and sold in drug stores under the name of Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They are small chocolate coated pellets and contain the active medicinal principle of sulphur in a highly concentrated, effective form.

Few people are aware of the value of this form of sulphur in restoring and maintaining bodily vigor and health: sulphur acts directly on the liver, the excretory organs and purifies and enriches the blood by the prompt elimination of waste material.

Our grandmothers knew this when they dosed us with sulphur and molasses every spring and fall, but the crudity and impurity of ordinary flowers of sulphur were often worse than the disease, and cannot compare with the modern concentrated preparations of sulphur, of which Stuart's Calcium Wafers is undoubtedly the best and most widely used.

They are the natural antidote for liver and kidney troubles, and cure constipation and purify the blood in a way that often surprises patient and physician alike.

Dr. R. M. Wilkins while experimenting with sulphur remedies soon found that the sulphur from Calcium was superior to any other form. He says: "For liver, kidney and blood troubles, especially when resulting from constipation or malaria, I have been surprised at the results obtained from Stuart's Calcium Wafers. In patients suffering from boils and pimples and even deep seated carbuncles, I have repeatedly seen them dry up and disappear in four or five days, leaving the skin clear and smooth. Although Stuart's Calcium Wafers is a proprietary article, and sold by druggists, and for that reason tabooed by many physicians, yet I know of nothing so safe and reliable for constipation, liver and kidney troubles, and especially in all forms of skin disease, as this remedy."

And how charmed have I been with Christian College: what an elysium of sweetness and light, what a home of comfort and culture, what an academy of learning! What drill, what discipline, what training, what truth, for the mothers of the next generation! And last but not least, how winsome is the voice of the minister of the Church of Christ, how subdued is the music, how worshipful is the congregation, how helpful the whole service!

Since leaving my home in Alabama on Jan. 1, I have preached and lectured at Montgomery City, at Bolivar, and at Buffalo. I went to Buffalo to visit relatives and the brethren insisted on my making myself heard. I preached one week, during which three precious souls came out and owned their Lord. A heavy-seated cold kept me from protracting further, and also from filling an appointment at Ashley on Feb. 14. It will not be long when I shall have gotten into full correspondence with my new environments and acclimated to Missouri weather. Here's my hand to the Missouri brethren.

He first located in Albany to practice his profession, but soon removed to King City, where he soon was recognized as a prominent and skillful dentist, conscientious in his work, a Christian in his daily walk. He was the grandson of Judge Edward L. Ellis, a pioneer of Harrison County. His father, Frank P. Marsteller, is a deacon in the Albany Christian Church. Father, mother and wife survive him to mourn their loss, but not as those without hope. Dr. J. W. Ellis preached the funeral sermon in the Christian Church, Albany.

New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Religious progress seems to have been marking time in these provinces during the past two months. The weather has been a series of blizzards and cold waves, and the occupation of that oldest inhabitant, who was wont to regale us with anecdotes of the old-fashioned winter, is gone.

In the country places, roads have been blocked by snowstorms, and for several Lord's days in succession it has been impossible to hold the regular services. Under such circumstances there would be little of progress to report. Added to this, the mission board has been without an evangelist since Jan. 1, and bids fair to be without one for some weeks yet.

In my last note I spoke of a meeting at Nauwigewauk, reporting three additions with others expected. These expectations were realized by the addition of eleven others, and the meeting closed, leaving the church in a vigorous and active condition.

The home mission, or what you would call the state collection in February, was responded to liberally by practically every church in the two provinces, which gave much encouragement to the board, and shows plainly that the brethren are warmly interested in aggressive work. We need a strong evangelist permanently in the field, but that is a luxury we cannot pay for, so we must needs be contented with the best that we can pay for. The field is ripe unto the harvest. We need a threshing machine, and cannot even get a flail. Nevertheless we do not despair but trust, through the blessing of God, to make this year the best year in home mission work.

The Promise of Our English Work.

concerning its motives." The person is to judge himself as to his motives. Conscience cannot teach us what is right and what is wrong; but it can and does sit in judgment within us, and decide whether we are sincere or insincere in our resolves. That is all. Now, how can any committee or conclave decide on the motives of the individual? Let each have within the widest limits possible the prerogative of acting according to the dictates of his own conscience. The Bishop of Durham, Dr. Handley Moule, about whom I have in these articles written with admiration, has just this week done a very dangerous thing. He has preached in a Presbyterian church at Gateshead, at the invitation of its minister. His conscience allows and approves such a proceeding, but the Anglican conscience will fiercely condemn the noble prelate. What is needed in these days is the complete vindication of the individual conscience. That was the privilege for which Luther contended, and liberty of conscience was the keynote of the great Reformation in the sixteenth century. Were it ruling to-day, then such an alienation as that to which I have alluded between Churches of Christ would be impossible.

Notes on the English Work.

The new year of this mission is likely to be fruitful. At our London headquarters, Mark Wayne Williams, the bright importation from Iowa, has taken up the pastorate now for the last few months. He is gratified with happy signs of initial success. New people are not only coming to hear him as a novelty, but they are manifestly coming to stay. The tide has risen with a big wave. The same process is in operation at our mission in North London, where E. M. Todd migrated when he wished for a change after five years of strenuous and devoted labor of West London Tabernacle. He is formulating a scheme for building a permanent church in place of the iron chapel in which I had the honor of preaching for ten years. This will necessarily be a somewhat costly undertaking, but it is a vital need. It has been proposed that we should form a building fund for aiding the erection of new sanctuaries. I can perceive, much to my own gratification, a rising spirit of impatience in the brotherhood with the burdens of debt on the churches. The next stage in our history should witness the improvement of all these incumbrances off the face of the earth and the backs of the churches. At Cheltenham, J. H. Versey and his people have transformed and transfigured the interior of their pretty church. Brother Rapkin and his Birkenhead people are keenly anxious for the erection of the permanent church in that great town on the Mersey. We are grieved that the splendid work which Brother Mitchell has been doing in Liverpool, where there have been over a hundred additions during his eighteen months of the pastorate, is in danger of being cut short. Our Sister Mitchell is in very low health. There will be profound regret in the whole brotherhood if these two devoted workers should be constrained to return to America. To replace them adequately will be difficult, and we trust it may be possible for them to remain.

Harrison, O.

CALIFORNIA.—San Bernardino. —Moved into our new church home yesterday and had two baptisms at the first service. Many were touched to tears; it was a glorious meeting. The building is a thing of beauty, may it be a place of perpetual joy. We dedicate Feb. 28, and immediately after the dedication R. L. McHattan will hold us a revival.—J. R. SHIE, minister.

Hydesville, Feb. 15.—I have been here now two months and 18 days. There have been a number of confessions, and on Sunday night, Feb. 21, we will have our third baptismal service. The Bible-school is growing in interest and numbers; we have 62 on the roll. All the services of the church are well attended. The ordination and installation of the pastor for a period of five years on Jan. 17 was a beautiful success, conducted by Brother Markle, of Eureka, and Brother Hurst, of Fortuna. Both of these brethren have since resigned their pastorates. Humboldt county offers a great field for planting our standard, and we pray the Lord to send into this field clean and godly men to plead for primitive Christianity.—W. HENRY WARREN, pastor.

COLORADO.—Pueblo, Feb. 15.—The meeting at the Broadway Church of this city ended last night after running three weeks with 35 additions, 26 of these by baptism. J. H. Mohorter did the preaching and did it well. The church was much strengthened and blessed.—CLYDE DARSIE, pastor.

Canon City, Feb. 16.—I closed my work here yesterday. There were five additions at the last service—three others not previously reported—a total of 60 additions during my pastorate here of fourteen months.—WALTER KLINE

Grand Junction, Feb. 10.—Three additions since last report; two young men confessed at evening service on Feb. 7. The longer I am here the better I am pleased with the work. Gave the annual address to the order of "Eagles and Friends" in Park Opera House Sunday 2:30 with 1,208 present; 285 members.—F. F. WALTERS.

GRIP CONVALESCENCE

There's nothing better than Scott's Emulsion after the grip. When the fever is gone the body is left weak and exhausted; the nervous system is completely run down and vitality is low.

Two things to do: give strength to the whole body and new force to the nerves. Scott's Emulsion will do it; contains just what the worn-out system needs.

Rich blood, healthy flesh, resistive force, more and better nourishment are what Scott's Emulsion supplies to the convalescent.

We'll send you a sample free upon request.

SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl Street, New York.

FLORIDA.—Jacksonville, Feb. 15.—There were three additions to the Church Street Christian Church at the close of our regular service yesterday morning, Feb. 14, a gentleman, his wife, and a young lady. Others are expressing a deep interest in our work, and we look for future proofs of our labors ere long. At every service we meet brethren from our northern churches. We are simply preaching the gospel.—T. H. BLENUS, pastor.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Washington, Feb. 20.—At the regular semi-monthly minister's meeting Monday, 25 additions were reported by the city ministers. The writer is now in a meeting with the H Street Church—22 additions so far; large audiences and increasing interest; we continue.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

IDAHO.—Caldwell, Feb. 14.—Meeting here eight days old with 20 added and church aroused, Bro. Joel Fisher is pastor. Fifty-one were added in 23 days in our last meeting at the Dalles, Oreg.—J. B. HOLMES, evangelist.

ILLINOIS.—Elder H. M. Brooks recently held a two weeks' meeting at Kansas, Ill., with over 40 additions, 34 by confession and baptism. The church at Kansas is in a prosperous condition, having recently expended several hundred dollars repairing and otherwise beautifying their church building. Their auditorium is one of the nicest in the town. They have a fine Sunday-school and interesting prayer meeting. The young people especially take great interest in church work.

Charleston, Feb. 19.—Allen Wilson here 12th day with 42 accessions. Great preaching and great crowds. We hope for many more.—WILL F. SHAW.

Charleston, Feb. 16.—The meeting here by Allen Wilson grows in interest nightly. Crowded house, increasing interest and enlarged results at every service. Meeting one and a half weeks old with 30 additions.—P. W. HARDING.

Rushville, Feb. 14.—Closed a three weeks' meeting with home forces, resulting in 12 additions, 10 by confession, two by letter.—C. B. DABNEY.

Eureka, Feb. 9.—Brother Stivers, of Knoxville, has just closed an excellent meeting there with 92 additions; over 80 were adults and 85 were by immersion; about 40 men. There were eight confessions and one reclaimed the last night. I will visit them every Sunday now instead of alternate Sundays.—B. H. SEALOCK.

Roodhouse, Feb. 15.—I held a 12 days' meeting at Hamburg Bay, Calhoun county. Result, 44 added, 26 baptisms, one from Catholic, 12 reclaimed, three from Methodists and three by relation. Our Sunday-school has increased from 100 pupils to more than 300. The Christian Endeavor began the year with an attendance of less than 20; last evening we had more than 150 young people present at the meeting.—H. O. PRITCHARD.

Logansport, Feb. 17.—Just came in to-day from a two weeks' meeting with the Carnahan Church; nine confessions and baptisms. Church greatly rejoices. Bro. T. M. Wiles, of Anderson, speaks for them next Lord's day.—A. M. HOOTMAN.

Randolph county hopes to do better for missions this March than ever. Brother Crutcher is visiting the county churches.—J. R. PERKINS.

St. Louis, Feb. 22.—The following churches of this city have received the following additions, hitherto unreported: Compton Heights, 10 additions in last three weeks, nine by baptism; Central, one by letter; Maplewood, four confessions; Carondelet, six additions since last report, one confession, five by letter. A movement is on foot to erect a new church house in South Bellaire.—S. T. MARTIN.

Dunham Ave., Cleveland, Feb. 15.—Three confessions here yesterday.—M. J. GRABLE.

Harrison, Feb. 15.—Byron Burditt, of Lafayette, Ind., sang for M. L. Buckley in the meeting here fifteen days, and had to leave in the midst of the meeting to fill another engagement. Meeting continues with home forces; 18 baptisms, one reclaimed.—M. L. BUCKLEY.

Mt. Healthy, Feb. 15.—The annual business meeting of the Mt. Healthy church was held on the last Wednesday evening of January. The following is a summary of the reports given: Total moneys received from all sources, $2,192.80; receipts exceed last year's by $328.16; receipts for missions in excess of last year's, $145.29. The treasurer reported a balance in the treasury, Dec. 31, of $120.82. The church has not one dollar of indebtedness. The church gave for missions last year $682.38, or $4.25 per member. The reports revealed the fact that those who gave most liberally for missions were the best contributors to the current expenses of the church. Membership, 160; number of additions for the year, 16—14 by baptism; enrollment of Sunday-school, 223, 90 of whom are in the home department. Refreshments were served at the close of the business session. This has been one of the very best years in the history of the church.—A. C. GRAY, pastor.

tendance and interest was good all the time. Brother Ingle preaches with force and goes deep into his subjects. There have been 58 additions to the church since our building was dedicated in March, 1903. Sunday-school has very good attendance.—C. F. VAUGHN, Supt. of S. S.

Perkins.—Jan. 31.—I closed a three weeks' meeting here with J. W. Garner and people. Eighty-one were added, including a prominent Baptist minister, Brother Reynolds. This was my second meeting with these people. I have accepted the pastorate here, and began work last Lord's day.—T. L. NOBLITT.

Walters, Feb. 16.—Preached at Alva Sunday with three baptisms. Good audiences. Will hold a meeting in a few weeks. W. B. Ingle is doing fine work at Ingersoll and other points. Will dedicate at Ashley, Sunday the 21st.—O. D. MAPLE.

Newkirk, Feb. 15.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting in which there were 17 accessions to the church. Bro. C. H. White, of Perry, did the preaching. This is the third meeting in which we have worked together. Our work here at Newkirk was never so prosperous as now.—F. D. WHARTON.

Tonkawa, Feb. 18.—We have just closed a good meeting. J. A. Overstreet and wife, of Chickasha, I. T., had charge of the music. Dr. Ashley S. Johnson had been secured to do the preaching, but he had no more than started when he took sick and it fell upon the pastor to do the preaching. After seventeen days of faithful work, we closed with 32 additions to the church. This is the seat of the University Preparatory School of Oklahoma, with 350 students. It is an important center, and our people are wide awake. We have about 175 members, and the largest audiences in the city. The church is harmonious, and enthusiasm runs high.—CLAY T. RUNYON.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Wilkes Barre, Feb. 14.—The Lord greatly honored his word at the morning service to-day. The little meeting was a large one in spiritual meaning. Six obeyed the Master, and one reclaimed. Of the six buried with their Lord, five were males, two heads of families. Feb. 14 will live with the First Church of Christ here in sweet memory.—E. E. C.

Washington, Feb. 15.—This historic church proposes now to become a living link on the foreign field. W. P. Bently our link. Six confessions during regular services the past week. Forty-five since Thornton meeting began. Thirty-one baptisms.—E. A. COLE, pastor.

Sandy Lake, Feb. 15.—Our meeting is still increasing in interest. Seventeen added to date; more to come.—THOMAS MARTIN.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—Sumter, Feb. 17.—W. M. Taylor, general evangelist of the south, under the American Christian Missionary Society, assisted by S. D. Colyer of the church at Orangeburg, S. C., and Albert E. Fitts, the state evangelist, just closed a successful meeting here with 20 additions, four from the denominations, three by baptism, and the rest by statement. Brother Taylor organized a Church of Christ, and the prospects are bright for a strong congregation. We organized a Bible-school with about 30 members. Brother Fitts will keep the congregation together until we can get a pastor. We need a young man, a good personal worker, who would be willing to start on a very small salary. The field is ripe for our plea, and we have the whole city stirred. We are meeting in a hall in the main part of the city, until we can get a church home.—JOSEPH W. HELMS.

TEXAS.—Seymour, Feb. 16.—Last Lord's day we organized a Junior Endeavor with 15 members. We have also organized a Senior Endeavor, a C. W. B. M., prayer-meeting, Ladies' Aid and Sunday-school.—R. H. H. BURNETT, pastor.

WYOMING.—Sheridan, Feb. 16.—One confession at regular services since last report. Last Lord's day was the first anniversary of the organization of the Sheridan Church. From the first, 142 names have been enrolled and the present membership is about 130. We start into the second year with bright prospects.—F. E. BLANCHARD.

With Us, But Not Of Us.

No one can read Bro. L. W. Spayd's story of his mission to South Africa, as it appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST recently, without being profoundly moved. It also seems to me that it is impossible to resist the conclusion that there are brethren who have been counted "with us," but who are not and never have been of "us." Men have entered the reformation movement who never really understood, or if they understood, never fully endorsed its principles. They have caught one phase of the purpose to restore the apostles' church, but they have not caught the union phase of that purpose. This movement was born in a plea for Christian union. In its very nature, it recognized the presence of Christians in all denominations. It sought to alienate the differences and emphasize the points of agreement. It proposed Christian union upon the basis of the Bible. "Where the Bible speaks, we speak; where the Bible is silent, we are silent." This was applied to matters essential to salvation and not to matters of opinion, or question of expediency. Christian union upon this basis meant simply that we would require as conditions and tests of fellowship just such, and only such things as the Bible declared to be conditions of salvation. These conditions were discovered to be "faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and obedience to his commandments." Here there must be unity. Outside of this, there should be allowed the largest liberty. To my understanding, this is the very soul and spirit of our movement. And in the light of such principles, how absurd to talk about making the use, or non-use of organs and missionary societies tests of fellowship! How absurd to set up close communion, or refuse offerings from outsiders, or make opposition to the "one man pastor system," whatever that may mean, a test of fellowship! These things have no part nor lot in the principles for which we plead. It would be far more to our credit intellectually to divide over such abstruse doctrines as the trinity, election, free grace, etc., than over these things. We had just as well divide over the use of "hooks and eyes," or the wearing of buttons on the back of a man's coat, as to set up these things as tests of fellowship. Written or unwritten, such tests constitute a human creed, and the man who seeks to overthrow denominationalism by the use of such means, is only inviting those who wear such a yoke to give up a yoke of iron for a yoke of brass. I do not doubt that there are many conscientious, pious men among these brethren. They are doing what they think is right. But they are deceiving themselves in thinking that they are advocating the "principles of the reformation." If any "sects grow out of this movement," it will not be the fault of the principles for which we plead, but the fault of men who have not fully grasped these principles, who have never fully escaped the bonds of the sectarian spirit.

What are we to do about it? Nothing, but to preach the truth in love. Nothing, but to be true to the truth and strong in the truth.

The truth will yet prevail. We need not fear for that. We should take care only that we be not turned aside from the truth. Nothing but to live up to and spread far and wide the principles of the motto, "Loyalty to Christ, liberty in Christ, unity upon Christ and service for Christ."

A. R. MOORE.

I heartily endorse your tract suggestion in a recent issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is in line with what I have been thinking and planning on the subject. I have planned to send out one tract per month this year to all the unconverted within the influence of our church. It is difficult to find tracts suitable for this purpose. Many of the best tracts contain out-of-date statistics. Nearly all need to be revised, and many should be re-written.

Why not plan a series of tracts, setting forth systematically and in order the principles of our restoration movement, and assign them to some of our leading brethren for writing? Let the new board of evangelization take up this work, have the tracts printed in large quantities and sell them to our preachers and evangelists at actual cost; or, if possible, create a fund for this work and distribute them free to all who will use them. In five years we ought to leaven the whole nation with our plea for union, if this work were taken up in earnest. When we celebrate our centennial in 1909, let us have the world informed as to what we are celebrating. The World's Fair this year offers a rare opportunity for a wholesale distribution of stirring literature on our movement.

I suggest also that pastors preach a "tract sermon" occasionally, and that when they are sending out missionary letters and collection envelopes to all their members, a helpful tract be enclosed. This will reach every member with several splendid tracts every year. Information begets inspiration.

A Tribute to E. L. Craig.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON: I have read the birthday issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with great interest. While I most heartily and sincerely congratulate you upon your great work, and the management of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, upon its splendid record during a varied history of forty years, I do not write this belated word with any special view to publication. At least, personally, I wish to pay a tribute to Bro. E. L. Craig, the first editor of the Gospel Echo. I well remember, in 1864 teaching school at Walker-ville, Ill., in Green county, of which Carrollton was the county seat, to have met Brother Craig—a green, bashful youth, "seedy as a raspberry," to use a metaphor of Mrs. Wiggs. I was trying to earn money with which to complete a college course. To the personal interest shown by this godly man, I owe the determination, then unformed, to enter the Christian ministry. I shall not forget his invitation to speak in his church, nor the delicate consideration with which he overlooked my embarrassment and weakness and gave fatherly counsel. He even asked me to write for his paper occasionally, and once or twice tolerated attempts to occupy the poet's corner, though I have long since discarded any thought of ability in that direction. I do not know his later history, but I have always revered his memory. It has been an example before me to help and encourage young men. I am sure not only the outcome of his editorial venture, but the smaller deeds of kindness are remembered by others as well as by me.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON: In the Sunday-school lesson in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Dec. 31, you say of John's baptism, "Apparently it was a familiar rite, for it does not appear that much explanation of it was needed." This implies that if it had not been a familiar rite, much explanation would have been necessary. If these suppositions are true, then we ought to be able to find this much explanation at whatever time the rite originated. Can you inform me as to where I can find this explanation? If you can, we can settle the date of the institution of baptism. Furthermore, if baptism could have been introduced prior to John's time without much explanation, why should we conclude that much explanation would have been necessary to introduce it in John's day? Isn't Homer nodding a little? T. D. SECREST.

John the Baptist, during which the rite of baptism and many observances might have come into use. We have no inspired record of anything during these silent centuries. The absence of any recorded explanation of baptism during this period therefore affords not even presumptive evidence that the rite was not introduced and explained during this time. But the absence of any word of explanation from John's discourse when he is talking about baptism, does, it seems to us, warrant the presumption that it was not wholly unfamiliar to his hearers. We do not feel like being dogmatic on the subject, for this is not a proof. But this and other considerations seem to establish a probability that immersion was practiced before John.—EDITOR.]

Social Ethics: An Introduction to the Nature and Ethics of the State. By James Melville Coleman. (The Baker & Taylor Company.)

Prof. Coleman discusses the phenomena of organized society from a distinctively Christian point of view. No philosophy of the social order can be truly cosmic and comprehensive which does not take into consideration the spiritual nature of man and the spiritual forces of society. The state is less a material than a spiritual fact; not a complex of specialized forces working as parts of a material organism for the supply of material needs, but a moral personality. The relations of the state to the individual and of the state to the church are dominated by this conception, and the phenomena of the social order and the methods of control employed by the state are interpreted from the same point of view. The author believes it to be a fact not only of theology but of sociology and jurisprudence that all authority comes from God through Christ. The authority exercised by the state is delegated to it by Christ and not by the common consent of the individuals within the state. He believes that there should be a social confession of Christ by an amendment to the federal constitution, which would create no entangling alliance between church and state, but would simply acknowledge the will of God as revealed in Christ as the ethical standard for legislative, executive and judicial conduct. The book was originally intended for use as a text book, but its very readable style fits it for more general circulation.

Sevastopol and Other Military Tales. By Leo Tolstoy. Translated by Louise and Aylmer Maude. (Funk & Wagnells, $1.50.)

This is the first volume of what is to be a complete and uniform library edition of Tolstoy's works. These military tales and sketches were the first fruit of Tolstoy's genius. They grew out of his personal experiences as an officer in the Russian army during the Crimean war and were written very shortly afterward, before he had worked out the social and political theories which have found embodiment in his later works. He had not yet come to the point of opposing war as a matter of principle, but he saw and depicted with terrible vividness the horrors of war as a matter of practice. What Verestchagin does with paint and brush, Tolstoy does with words. Even at this early period and in the description of scenes which might seem to call for a vocabulary of thunderous adjectives, the style shows that same simplicity and restraint which marks the master in his later works. The edition is issued in handsome form, and it will be worth while for persons who are interested in securing a complete edition of Tolstoy to take note of this one. The volumes can be obtained separately, however.

The History and Use of Hymns and Hymn Tunes. By Rev. David R. Breed, D. D. (Revell, $1.50 net.)

There is no other volume known to us which will give the minister or choir leader so much trustworthy information about things he ought to know about church music, as can be obtained from this volume. It presupposes no great acquaintance with musical theory, but is sufficiently explicit and technical for all practical purposes. It should be studied not only by those who wish to know the history of sacred music, but by those who are interested in developing the musical part of public worship to its highest degree of usefulness.

Builders of the Beautiful. By H. L. Piner. (Funk & Wagnells, $1.50 net.)

"Humanity cannot become ugly so long as it keeps a beautiful soul." This sentence might be given as a text for the entire volume. That the soul is the builder of the body; that the body is the dramatization of the soul; that the visible form and features are a legible record of the inner life; and that it is a moral and religious duty to realize beauty of body through beauty of soul—these are the doctrines herein declared. Certainly there is a large measure of truth in them, and the author is enthusiastic, eloquent and inspiring in their advocacy.

A Harmony of the Gospels. By John D. Kerr, D. D. (American Tract Society, $1.50.)

The notable fact about this harmony is that it uses the American Standard Edition of the revised Bible and is in that respect more up-to-date than any other work in its class. Otherwise it is very similar to the harmonies with which our readers are already familiar, such as that of Stevens and Burton.

More Preachers Needed.

with a powerful and consecrated faculty will discover more great men by placing expenses and course of study in reach of the poor than by offering heavy courses at heavy expense. Such a school will send out a good many men who are willing and glad to preach in small towns and country places for $500 a year, and I say God bless them.

But of the number who would go to such a school, here and there will be found one as tall as a tree—a great soul—and such as he will not stop short of the college and university.

There need be no uneasiness about such men when once they have tasted the luxury of self-discovery.

I am urging a school where a young man with very limited education can enter and take the work just where he is, and maintain his self-respect—a school where such a student will not be scoffed at by students or professors,—just because he chooses for the present an English education and the study of the Bible from the point of such education.

This, I believe, can best be accomplished in a school which is wholly preparatory, so far as classical and Biblical education is concerned. But I urge that as a people we can well afford to equip a number of such schools.

Let the equipment in way of men and material be adequate and liberal, and it will solve the problem of higher education among us. The state universities are claiming our high school graduates.

From what source are we to fill our church schools? I answer from first-class preparatory schools. Apply business principles in such a way as to make expenses commensurate with the purses of the poor, then find men for teachers who know young men, and who love them. Such teachers should have a two-fold equipment—light and power. The Savior taught his disciples. They knew the message they were to bear, but he said, Go ye into

What the Rich Man Gets from Wealth.

By Frank Honeywell.

"All that the rich man gets from wealth is but his clothes and board," I heard a preacher say as he advised men not to hoard
A great amount of gold. Said he, "The surplus vast you store
Away in vaults and banks and stocks would give to many a poor
And needy child and mother what belongs to them by right
Of birth, who have not strength enough to mingle in the fight
For life and food and shelter. Oh, why should you e'er refuse To aid the sore distressed throng with what you cannot use?"

"Who would be great? I ask of you of affluence and lands—
And do you know what marks of greatness judge of time demands?
And why it is the greatest men of time have never sought
To fill their vaults with riches, but to vault the heights of thought?—
And here I ask you, by the way, what height of thought's contained
In massing wealth, wherein your usefulness is all profaned?
That man is greatest who sees best, and acts accordingly,
Why God has given him his measure of ability."

When I was but a stripling youth, my eagerness was bent
To save ten thousand dollars, then my mind would be content.
All surplus that I earned henceforth to charity should be thrown;
But my ten thousand wish, somehow, a million since has grown,
Then met a sudden, tragic death before that preacher's sword:
"All that the rich man gets from wealth is but his clothes and board."
So I will wait no longer for ten-thousand-dollar times,
But humbly be content to give my nickles and my dimes.

A Little Knight.

Not to look at. No. He looked rather funny as he laboriously climbed the tram-car steps; for his legs were very short and he could get no help from his hands, for one carried his school books and the other held something squeezed up tight.

But the conductor knew him well and helped him up; and he appeared in the doorway smiling broadly at the passengers, who all smiled back into the round freckled face with such a mere button of a nose that it looked as if it had been pounded in.

A little friend of his, who had evidently been crying, was sitting in the other end of the car, and the little knight made his way up to where she was sitting.

"Hullo, Jenny!" he said, in his cheerful voice.

"O John," said Jenny, with a little catch in her voice, "I've lost my money, I think, down here on the floor! And now I can't go to the show. I've looked and looked for it."

"Can't you get another?" asked John anxiously, looking sharply at the floor.

"No. We are such a big family, you see, and I am in the middle of it. And people in the middle of families, I don't think ever get extras. They always take what's left."

"Yes, I've noticed that," said John.

"I'm in the middle, too, and things are always too big or too little for me. I got six-pence running on an errand for grandma," he added, opening up his squeezed-up hand and showing the moist bit of silver which meant so much to him. "I say, Jenny," he added heroically, "you take mine. Girls care more about things than—than—boys."

But Jenny was proof against this temptation. She shut her eyes and shook her head hard. "No, indeed, I won't take yours," she said firmly. "I guess I know about boys and shows. I've saved this money for the longest time, and I was so glad when the man said the school children could come for six-pence. But now!"

The tears were coming again, and John dropped down to look for the coin.

He hunted for some minutes; and a sharp-eyed woman saw him drop his coin down in the straw, then pick it up. Then he rose up.

"Here you are, Jenny," he said.

"O John, thank you!" cried Jenny, beaming, "I never can find things."

When they got off at the school house, the sharp-eyed woman got off, too.

And that may have explained the fact that John's teacher at recess handed him a square envelope. In it was a ticket to the show, a bright silver sixpence, and a tiny slip of paper, on which was written, "For the good knight, John." John did not understand that very well; the only knight he knew much about was a disagreeable time of day connected with bedtime. But he understood the money and the ticket very well; and he beamed like a small, freckled sun, as you do when you are young and in the middle of a family and delightful things happen.—Youth's Companion.

A King on His Knees.

King James II. one day lost some important papers. He hunted for them until at last he got into a great rage because he couldn't find them. Then he met an old Scotch servant who had been a long time in his service, and he charged him with the loss. Gib (that was his name) said that he knew nothing of them. But the king grew very angry and said: "Gib, remember I gave them to you to take care of, what have you done with them?" Gib fell on his knees, and declared that he had not received them. Then the king kicked him as he kneeled at his feet. Gib rose and left the apartment, saying: "I have always been faithful to your majesty, and I have not deserved such treatment. I cannot remain in your service. I shall never see you again!"

Not long after the person to whom the king had actually given the papers returned them. The king was ashamed of his conduct, and sent someone after the old servant. Very reluctantly Gib came again into the royal presence when the king got down on his knees before him, and said that he would not rise until he forgave him. The servant tried to evade the matter, and begged his master to rise, but he would not, till assured that the insult was fully forgiven.

It is a maxim in a monarchy that

EXTRAORDINARY MERIT

Of a New Catarrh Cure.

Physicians are slow to take up new and untried remedies, until their value has been established by actual experiment, and they are naturally skeptical of the many new preparations constantly appearing and for which extravagant claims are made.

The most liberal and enlightened physicians are always ready, however, to make a fair trial of any new specific and get at its true medical value.

A new preparation for the cure of catarrh has attracted much attention in the past few months and has met with great favor from the medical profession not only because it is remarkably successful in the cure of catarrh, but also because it is not a secret patent medicine; anyone using it knows just what he is taking into his system.

It is composed of blood root which acts on the blood and mucous membrane, hydrastin for same purpose to clear the mucous from head and throat, and red gum of eucalyptus tree to destroy catarrhal germs in the blood.

All of these antiseptic remedies are combined in the form of a pleasant-tasting tablet or lozenge, and are sold by druggists under name of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, and many recent tests in chronic catarrh cases have established its merit beyond question.

Dr. Sebring states that he has discarded inhalers, sprays and washes and depends entirely upon Stuart's Catarrh Tablets in treating nasal catarrh. He says: "I have had patience who had lost the sense of smell entirely, and whose hearing was also impaired from nasal catarrh, recover completely after a few weeks use of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets. I have been equally successful with the remedy in catarrh of the throat and catarrh of stomach. I can only explain it on the principle that catarrh is a constitutional disease, and that the antiseptic properties in these tablets drives the catarrhal poison completely out of the system."

Dr. Odell says, I have cured many cases of catarrh of stomach in past four months by the use of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets alone without the use of any other remedy and without dieting. The tablets are especially useful in nasal catarrh and catarrh of the throat, clearing the membranes and overcoming the continual hawking, coughing and expectorating, so disgusting and annoying to catarrh sufferers.

"the king can do no wrong." It is pleasant to find one who, having done a wrong, was humble enough to confess it, and beg pardon, even of a servant.—American Boy.

A certain young man was sent to a British theological seminary. His father was anxious that the boy's scholastic pursuits should not be interfered with by any premature affairs of the heart, and wrote to the head of the institution to keep an eye on the young man. Within a month the youth was appointed to teach a young ladies' Bible class. In reply to the father's remonstrance, the principal said that there is safety in numbers. The father answered: "You don't know the boy. The only safety for him is in exodus. Send him home."

Belinda's been a-shopping,
She's looked at silks galore,
And hats and hose and velvet
Enough to stock a store.

She's asked the price of bronzes,

She's looked at Persian prayer-rugs
And turquoise-shell lorgnettes.

She bought, and had delivered,

"Inasmuch as Ye Did it Not."

"Master, I have this day broken no law of the Ten—have hurt no one. Is it enough?"

"Child, there stood one by thy side burdened with heavy tasks of lowly, earthly labor. For a little help, a little easing of the burden, he looked to thee. Thou hadst time and strength."

"Master, I did not see."

"Thine eyes were turned within. There was an ignorant one crying from out his darkness: 'Will none teach me?' I have given thee knowledge."

"Master, I did not hear."

"Thine ear was dull. There came a guest to seek thy converse, a human friend in quest of fellowship. I marked thy sigh, thy frown. Why was thy heart not glad?"

"I was reading. I hate to be disturbed, to be called from great thoughts to trifling talk."

"The children would have had thee some few moments in their play. Without thee they went wrong—how far wrong thou wilt not know. It is too late."

"Child's play? But I was searching for a hidden truth of spiritual import."

"Thou didst not turn aside to lift that lame one who had fallen by the way."

"I was in haste to do what I had planned. I meant to help him when I should return."

"Another lifted him. And shall I question further?"—Selected.

Good Interest.

"My son," said a banker to his son, "I want to give you a lesson in business. Here is a half-dollar. Now, if you can find any boy whom you can trust, who will take this money and pay you interest on it, you may lend it to him and if you invest this wisely, I'll increase your capital."

When night came, the banker said, "My son, how did you invest your money to-day?"

"Well, father," replied the little fellow, "I saw a boy on the street without any shoes, and he had no dinner; so I gave him my fifty cents to buy something to eat with."

"You'll never make a business man in the world," said the banker; "business is business; but I will try you once more. Now, here is a dollar to invest; see how well you can do it."

The boy laughed aloud, and then explained: "My Sunday-school teacher said giving to the poor was lending to the Lord; and she said he would return to us double; but I did not think he would do it so quick."—The Advocate.

Troubles That Never Come.

The story is told of a lady who for a time kept a list of impending troubles. It was a relief to see them down in black and white. Some months later, in looking over the list, she was surprised to find that nine-tenths of these troubles had never materialized. They had an existence only in her imagination. The troubles that never come form the heaviest part of our daily load. The worry, the fear caused by these apprehended miseries, often work sad havoc with brain and nerves. The actual sorrows, the bereavements, the disappointments, have their comfort and cure. But there is no cure for troubles that never come. They are haunting ghosts, unsubstantial as mist, but very real in their depressing and harmful power over us. There is toil in our daily living; there is weariness; still blessed rest will follow. But the weariness of imagined burdens drags the very heart and hope out of those who indulge in these unhealthy fancies.

Each day comes as a fresh gift from the hand of God. In it are just the experiences his loving wisdom has ordained. Meet with a brave heart all that is in the day's portion, but shrink not from phantom lions or from shadows that seem to blot out the sun.—Selected.

The people of Germany have taken up the alcohol question with an energy excelled by no other people on the face of the earth. Good Templar lodges are multiplying every year. The Blue Cross has spread all over the empire. The Imperial Health office at Berlin is sending out elaborate literature against the use of alcohol as a beverage. Count Douglas, the brother-in-law of the emperor, is one of the foremost temperance reformers in the country, and, day after day, the Journal of the Imperial Parliament has contained pages of his arguments against drink.—The Universalist Leader.

A good story is told of Professor Jebb. In the class-room immediately above his own, Professor Veitch lectured on logic. One day the peroration of the professor of logic was greeted with such rapturous applause, that it brought down some pieces of ceiling in the room below. As the bits of plaster dropped about his room, Professor Jebb quietly remarked: "Gentlemen, our premises will not support the conclusion of the professor of logic."

AMERICA FOR CHRIST

The American Christian Missionary Society calls attention to the vast need of our beloved country. Three-fourths of the land is missionary territory to us. Ours is the plea which presents the gospel as the power of God unto salvation. There never was a time when our plea was more gladly received or more productive of immediate results. In thirteen weeks, since the Detroit Convention, through regular channels. Add to this 1,459 who have come to us from the denominations, and we have a total of 22,688 additions in thirteen weeks, or an average of 1,745 per week.

21,229 Baptisms Have Been Reported

We can be said to have firmly established the cause in but eight states. In nearly all the other states our cause is still in its infancy and can not live without help. More than $50,000 additional appropriations have been asked for already this year. This in the face of the fact that but $56,000 of last year's income was available for mission work.

The Home Board is asking of the brethren $200,000 this year, for pressing needs.

The Corresponding Secretary asks that this great work shall be given its rightful place in the hearts and the help of the brotherhood. The Board is planning wisely and broadly. They ask the preachers to join with them in a mighty forward movement. May is the date of concerted action. Shall we prepare for it? Write us your heart.

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER IV.—CONCLUDED.

As George ate his cool dinner in the kitchen—always under the cooler eye of Mrs. Binitter, the sun made his appearance, and flooded the wet earth with rich August gold. Half an hour later, there was not a cloud in the sky. Birds were singing gaily as George drove the wagon back to town. Hens with feathers already dried, stepped gingerly from yards into the road, to see what worms had been washed out of the heavens. The trees were putting out their freshly washed green dresses to dry. The smell of the air reminded the young "delivery-man" of cows coming home in the evening, and standing near the gate in high clover. It was a good world to be in, but George was using it as a place in which to think over his troubles; the sunshine, the birds, the hens, and even the memory of cows, were lost upon him. It may seem a small thing to grieve over, that he had not received an invitation to Linnie Greer's party; but nearly all troubles are small as we look back upon them from the distance of time, and the old man finds that the sorrows of middle age was no more important than the grief of childhood.

When George drove up before the platform in front of Mr. Stoner's grocery, Linnie Greer was just coming out of the door. George expected her to turn away without recognition; but he was mistaken.

"Hello, George," said Linnie with a polite smile,—she was a very ladylike little person, and she smiled by rule,— "how is the Green Witch?"

"Hello," said George, dismounting from under the green umbrella. "What do you mean?"

"You seemed very much interested by her conversation," said Linnie, slowly moving on.

"Where were you?" George asked, turning very red.

"At my window," said Linnie, still retreating. "There was a crowd of us looking out. At first I said I knew you couldn't be riding with her. But, you see, I didn't know you as well as I thought."

"Well," said George desperately, "what's the matter with her?"

"Oh, nothing!" cried Linnie, with a very grown-up intonation. She added sweetly, "Goodby."

George looked sorrowfully and indignantly after the slight form. He contrasted her bright clothes with his mean attire; her bonnet,—she often wore a bonnet when upon parade,—with his broad-brimmed workman's hat; and her shimmering blue silk parasol with his coarse green umbrella and its circle of glaring white letters to this effect: "I AM SOLD by O. P. Doffitt AND CO." But more than all, he contrasted her former with her present manner. She had been his favorite of all his associates. He had confided in her his plans, his ambitions, his failures. She had often given him encouragement, and always friendly sympathy. Yet now, everything was different because he drove a grocery wagon to earn a livelihood for himself and his father. When she gave her last party, he had helped make out the list of names, and he and she had jointly written the invitations. And now!—

The Stoner household slept late on Sunday mornings. George ate with the family for the first time since his arrival. "Pa," said Spot, as they seated themselves at the table, "what do you think? George has been up two hours, studying!"

Mr. Stoner gave George a scrutinizing glance and said, "Well, its Sunday, the day's his. But studying and working don't go together."

"You forget such instances as Lincoln," spoke up old Mr. Halway with his serene smile.

"I don't want any Lincolns working for me, though," said Mr. Stoner. "A person that's always thinking about himself, and his improvements, isn't going to be a good delivery-boy. I know Lincoln split rails, and studied at night. But if he'd slept at night, I guess he could have split more rails, the next day."

"Well, pa," said Flora, "George can't do more than drive the wagon, can he? If he slept every minute from closing-time till opening-time, there would be only old Poll to switch along."

"I know this," said Mr. Stoner, looking at his second cup of coffee as if he suspected it of something, "a person with his thoughts all wool-gathering, can't keep his mind on his work. A delivery-boy should think of nothing but the parcels in his wagon, and the shortest routes. A grocer should keep his whole stock on his brain, and the prices at his tongues' end, and his customers' reliability infallibly pictured upon his mind. A man in business will succeed if he thinks of his business. It's not enough for him to be in business, and drop it when he can. No, he must think it, he must make it a part of his very heart-pumpings. Take a successful banker; his heart pumps dollars and cents with its blood. Take my heart. The very beats of it mean potatoes and canned tomatoes, and Tom Somebody's debt that should be collected, and the price of sugar that must be marked up to-morrow. That's my heart. That's why I succeed."

"Still," said his father-in-law, "according to this philosophy, you leave out a great deal in life—I mean so much of its graces and innocent pleasures. If every business man were as you describe, there would be little sympathy among them. Each would pursue his own course, and become indifferent to all his fellowmen."

"What are you in business for?" demanded Mr. Stoner, argumentatively. "Isn't it to succeed? Then you must think your business, and not other people's. Are the majority of business men successful? Certainly not. Why? Because they try to combine with their profession the graces and the pleasures you speak of. They want to have a little of everything going, and so they don't have much of anything. Listen to me, George Clayton—and you, too, Spot"—this to his son who was gazing with a bored expression through the opposite window, "if you want to succeed, tie your mind to your work, and if you feel it slipping, and trying to soar, put on another clamp."

"But, after all," said Mr. Halway, "what do you mean by success? Do you think money is success?"

"I think enough of it is," said Mr. Stoner, with great decision, as he rose. "But I'd put it a different way. Success in business means crowding other people out of business. George's very beginning illustrates the point. He has crowded out Tuck Hootin, or whatever his name is, from driving the wagon. If he proves worthy, he'll crowd somebody out of a clerkship, one day; then somebody out of a partnership; and when he owns a store, he'll crowd out men from opening stores in his town."

"George says he never expects to run a store," observed Spot, "but I do. My mind has always been fixed upon business. I've got 'er clamped."

Mr. Stoner looked suspiciously at his son, and disparagingly at George. "That's why the world is full of failures," he said, turning to his father-in-law. "Nine-tenths of business men will tell you that they expect to be in some other business when they are older, or can afford it, or something happens."

George and Spot went to their room. "Say, George," said Spot, sociably, "a lot of us fellows are going to walk out to the tank to swim. What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to Sunday-school; it's about time, now."

"Oh! Well, what are you going to do when it is over?"

"I shall stay to church," replied George; "and when it's over, it will be dinner-time."

"Oh!" said Spot. "My! Hoo-ce! But you are religious! Wonder to me you'd study on Sunday morning."

"Well," said George, laughing, "you know the Bible allows us to get our ox out of the ditch on Sunday, and my brain is the heaviest kind of an ox, and it's in an awful ditch, and Sunday's my one chance."

"I don't see," Spot declared, "why you're so anxious to get an education, anyway. I'll have to go to the high school when it opens, but I can tell you, I'd rather drive the wagon! You see I wouldn't mind driving the wagon, since pa owns it. Better come with us fellows to the tank. It's going to be a hot day, and the water will feel dandy; and we're going to take out a package of cigarettes apiece, and there's a watermelon-patch handy, and the owners of it always go mooning off five miles to church every week. Boy, we'll make a red day of it! Better come!"

"It's nice of you to want me," said George, "but I guess I'll stand by the old ship."

There was something peculiarly attractive about Spot with his delicate, handsome face, his aristocratic bearing, his shapely hands and feet. Like his sister, he was a blonde. His crisp dark-gold hair stood in little curls all over his shapely head. His smile was like a sudden gleam of light upon white silk. It was a smile that made people glad when they saw it; and his merry blue eyes conferred a favor when they looked upon you. His father's wealth had not made him proud, and he was openly what Flora was at heart,—friendly to all.

"George," said Spot, laying his hand playfully upon the sturdier shouldier of his room-mate, "you are going about things in a wrong way. Now, you know I think as much of you as if you were a millionaire,—I can't say more than that. But lots of fellows aren't like me. They are apt to look down upon you because—because you drive pa's delivery-wagon. And you've got to overcome that prejudice. And the way to do it is to mix with 'em, and show 'em you're a jolly boy. When you can make people miss you, you've a foothold in their lives. But if you get off to one side, you'll find that all the world is passing down main street, and nobody will notice you. Better come with us."

"Spot," said George smiling and putting his hand upon the other's arm, "I mustn't go, and the more I listen, the worse I want to. So I'm going to run away, for I'm afraid of you this morning. What you say about the fellows looking down upon me has troubled me all week, so you have me in a tender spot. Good-by!" George seized his hat, still smiling, and ran from the room. The Sunday-school lesson was about Naaman bathing in the river Jordan, and during the hour George's mind kept straying to the distant tank, where he imagined the boys sporting in the cool waters. He fancied he saw them, when weary of diving and swimming and splashing, reclining upon the bank, each with a cigarette, the smoke curling upward, and a large watermelon in the background. They were laughing, and telling stories, and thinking themselves men. What pleasure had George in exchange for these delights?

The hour was dull because the teacher, a young substitute, had confessed "not looked at the lesson," and was obliged to keep an eye upon lesson book, and finger upon the place, and dared not venture out of the beaten road macadamized by the questions at the bottom of the page. During the interval between Sunday-school and church, every young person seemed to find a congenial companion except George. To be sure there were the usual friendless ones standing in the churchyard, but they did not belong to what George considered his social set. As he stood near the church steps, one of his old friends greeted him with, "Hi, grocery wagon! Been greased this morning?" Which was immediately followed by, "Say, George, are turnips up or down?" This was not meant as unkindness, but as sallies of wit for the edification of others. As two boys were hurrying by, one pushed against George, whereupon the other cried out severely, "Bob, quit a-shaking that wagon!" As Linnie Greer passed, arm-in-arm with Flora Stoner, Linnie said sweetly: "George, where is the little Green Witch this morning?"

"I don't know any more than you," said George gloomily.

Flora did not look at George, but when they had gone on, leaving a cloud of delicious odors upon the air, he heard her say, "Oh, Linnie! What did you mean? What is the Green Witch?"

"You'll have to ask him," Linnie retorted scornfully. "I don't know anything about her."

"George," said a passing youth, "going to Linnie Greer's party?"

"No, I'm not," said George.

Whereupon came the prompt retort, "I reckon you ain't invited, are you? Say! who hitched you up this morning?"

The unkindness and rudeness of youth differs in two important particulars from that of maturity. It is outspoken and unmistakable, but it springs from no deep-seated motive. Its very bluntness and carelessness robs it of much of its bitterness.

George knew that those who asked him if any of his spokes were loose, or if he had been hauled to the blacksmith shop that morning, spoke with a half-ashamed meanness that was almost good nature. What touched him keenly was not the unkind remark and gibing word, but the unmistakable fact that he was avoided.

"George," said a motherly, red-faced woman, by name Mrs. Klupertack, "I want you to come and see my Bill. He'd be awful pleased at your visit, and now that your pa is gone, you must get lonesome."

George thanked her. Bill Klupertack was a good boy, so far as George knew, he knew nothing of him except that Bill drove the 'bus. George felt in a sense lowered, at least in his own estimation, because he had been invited by Mrs. Klupertack, yet at the same time he was ashamed of this feeling. He thought she would never have invited him if she did not know that he had fallen from the position of the editor's son to a delivery boy. He could not remember that she had ever so much as addressed him before. At the same time he admitted to himself that her Bill might be more worthily than Linnie Greer's brother or Spot Stoner. He went home from church in great perplexity. He experienced the same difficulty much older people have encountered, in trying to reconcile social distinctions with differences of real moral and intellectual worth. It is like trying to ride two horses at the same time, one of which is fleetier than the other.

Echoes of Our Anniversary Number.

I have been a patron and a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST through all these years. I have always found a very close bond of fellowship existing between myself and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

S. C. HUMPHREY.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—The anniversary number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was a great delight to me. Throughout the years that have gone, this paper has stood for the best traditions of the Disciples of Christ.

A. L. MARRE.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—Allow me to congratulate you on the excellent presentation of your fortieth anniversary number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The words of praise from so many eminent sources are richly deserved.

S. T. WILLIS.

My only regret is that I have not for a longer time been a reader of your valuable paper. I like the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, its broad vision, its sweet spirit, its spiritual tone, its plea for the essential and highest in religious thought and life.

ERNEST W. ELLIOTT.

The evolution of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is indeed an interesting study. I am glad you have been permitted to stand so long at its head and have guided it so wisely and successfully. It has a high place in Christian journalism, and its future ought to be one of triumphant progress. The Lord's name is to be praised for the good you have done.

F. M. GREEN.

After ten and a half years of service, and a unanimous call to continue, with an increase of salary, J. A. Holton has resigned his work at New Union, Woodford Co., Ky., his resignation to take effect not later than April 1. He leaves the church in a most prosperous condition. Any preacher of ability desiring work with one of the best churches of the brotherhood, would do well to address Ernest Dunlap, Pisgah, Ky.

There is one thought in your last Easy Chair which has been especially helpful to me. It is the lesson of patience and resignation you have learned to get from your discouragements and seeming failures. That is a lesson we all of us need to learn, yet it is one of the most difficult. You have helped me in this and in many other ways and I thank you. I wish you many years yet of usefulness with both voice and pen.

GEO. L. PETERS.

On Two Continents.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—I have known you "on two continents," and your influence on both sides of "The blue and far-stretching deep" has been the same gentle, forceful, undaunted power for good. Since first we met, almost 24 years ago, the same lofty principles have characterized your life and labors. "Love to God and love to fellowmen. These are unconquerable."

G. E. IRELAND.

St. Louis, Jan. 23.

It is commonly said that in the world of thought there are two parties, the conservative and the progressive. It is well that this should be so, but the future belongs not with either extreme, but rather to a class that may be designated as the conservatively progressive—those who are too cautious to reject any of the good of the past, yet are hospitable to all new truth. To this class belongs the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Such a position is the only one that is safe.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

I have been stirred with deep emotions as I read the story of your struggles and trials in the critical days of the past. This puts an added value into the paper for me. But does not every good thing in this life come to us through somebody's suffering? My brother, I almost feel like saying, Father, you have rendered the cause of primitive Christianity a notable service through these years. Never once have those who know you doubted either your loyalty or your far-seeing vision.

W. F. TURNER.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—One of the first acts of my new life in Christ Jesus was to subscribe for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Every issue since then has been a welcome visitor to my home and it is to-day the most eagerly sought of all the papers or magazines that come to my desk. I do not believe that any other one influence, among us, has been as potent for good as this great paper. It has been the leader in presenting the only possible spirit in which the desire of our Lord for the unity of his disciples can ever be realized.

T. A. ABBOTT.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—I have been a subscriber and reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from the organization of the Christian Publishing Co., of which I was one of the original stockholders. After reading it for so many years with much pleasure and profit, I want to tell you it is the very best religious journal ever published. All through these years it has shown the sweet spirit of the Master in all things, and as it gets older it gets better and better. God bless Brother Garrison and keep him with us for many years yet to come.

J. D. NANCE.

About twenty-five years ago William Mason came from Missouri to Eminence, Ky., to spend the evening of his life with his children, and I was preaching for the church at Eminence. He thought strange that I did not take the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I protested that I had gotten an impression that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was unsound. He urged me to take it, and judge for myself. From that day to this I have grown to think more of the paper each succeeding year. I would like to do for many others what Brother Mason did for me,—get them to try the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

S. W. CRUTCHER.

With great pleasure and satisfaction, I have read all through the fortieth anniversary number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and while you are having so many to thank you for the great and faithful service you have rendered the cause of primitive Christianity, I only send this note to say that no one reads the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with more real delight and profit than your humble brother away over here on the Atlantic Coast. For years I have esteemed it one of the best friends in that circle of weekly visitors, who speak out of their wide learning and experience. May God spare your life to us many years.

Very sincerely,

PETER AINSLIE.

For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events

By a vote of 66 to 14, the Senate ratified the canal treaty with the Republic of Panama on Tuesday, February 23. Fourteen Democratic Senators voted with the majority. The present status of the isthmian canal affair is as follows: By resolution of the Senate and the House of Representatives more than a year ago, the President was instructed to make a treaty for the building of the canal by the Panama route and to purchase the treaty of the Panama Company for a sum not to exceed forty million dollars. After Colombia had refused to ratify such a treaty, Panama seceded and entered into a treaty with the United States. This treaty has now been ratified. It remains for the purchase of the property to be concluded and for the necessary appropriation bills to be passed by Congress. The transfer of the property will not take place until the litigation which has been commenced by Gen. Reyes in Paris to prevent the transfer without Colombia's sanction shall have been ended. This is not expected to be a serious matter. Several months will probably elapse before work upon the canal can actually be commenced. Meanwhile, however, our control of the isthmus will be complete and a regiment of United States infantry has already been ordered to relieve the marines who have been temporarily doing duty along the canal strip.

The Indians, who, according to the current theory, are wards of the government and are therefore entitled to protection by their guardian, are in danger of again getting the worst of it in a sale of the land of the Rosebud Sioux in South Dakota. A year ago, in what is known as the Lone Wolf decision, the United States Supreme Court held that our treaties with the Indians are not irrevocable and even when made for a specified term of years can be terminated by the government before the period expires. "The power exists," says the Court, "to abrogate the provisions of an Indian treaty, but presumably such power will be exercised only when circumstances demand in the interest of the country and the Indians themselves that it [the government] should do so. particularly if consistent with perfect good faith toward the Indians." There is now pending in Congress a bill bearing the harmless title, "An Act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation in South Dakota." Three years ago an attempt was made to persuade the Rosebud Indians to allow 416,000 acres of their land (all of it that lies in Gregory county) to be opened for settlement at the price of $2.50 an acre. The Indians insisted that the land was worth more than this, but agreed to accept payment at this rate if the government would assume the responsibility for the whole amount and save them from the loss, annoyance and delay which would be inevitable if they received payment from the individual settlers. The government was not willing to do this, and so the "agreement" failed for lack of agreement. Since then the Lone Wolf decision has been given, and now the abrogation of Indian treaties depends not upon agreement but upon legislation. So now the act with the harmless title is introduced into Congress, proposing to amend the old "agreement" by restoring to it precisely that feature which caused its rejection by the Indians, and to ratify it by an act of Congress since it cannot be ratified by the vote of the Indians as the treaty requires.

It is not necessary to impugn the good faith of those officers of the Department of the Interior who have recommended the passage of this act, but the effect of the act, as it appears to us, would be the perpetration of a gross swindle upon those who have a right to expect from the government both honest and efficient guardianship over their interests. If the proposed price were a fair one, there might be some argument in favor of compelling them to sell. We could use some variation of the old and familiar argument about the requirements of advancing civilization, and the impossibility of allowing the ignorance and prejudice of savages to stand in the way of the onward march of commerce and industry. But as a matter of fact, there is good evidence that the price proposed is nothing like a fair price for the property. Indian Commissioner Jones has stated officially that "a considerable portion of this land is worth two or three times" $2.50 an acre. He is said to have admitted privately that the whole tract would probably bring an average of $10 an acre in the open market. If this is the fact, then to take the lands away from their Indian owners and sell them at one-fourth of of their value under the guise of amending and ratifying an agreement which was never agreed to, seems to us a gratuitous and wholly unwarranted invasion of those Indian rights which even Congress is bound to respect.

The Hague Tribunal, to which were submitted the questions raised by the bombardment of Venezuelan ports a year ago by the impatient debtors of that Republic, has rendered its decision. The main question was whether or not those creditors which took steps toward collecting their claims by force should receive preferential treatment, and the Tribunal decided in favor of the belligerents, England, Germany and Italy. We can not but regard this decision as unfortunate. Since by the terms of this decision the powers which appealed to force for the collection of their debts will be paid before those which relied upon peaceable methods, it seems inevitable that it will encourage the use of threats and force for the collection of claims against weak governments. The Hague tribunal was unanimously of the opinion that the belligerent attitude of Germany, Great Britain and Italy toward Venezuela had given a certain de facto urgency to their claims which the tribunal was not justified in overlooking. The Monroe Doctrine has, however, come through the entire incident with undiminished force. Even if these powers have secured prompt payment of their claims by the use of force, nothing that the Hague Tribunal has said or is likely to say can justify any European power in acquiring territory on this continent under the guise of collecting a debt.

Most of the news of the war in the far east comes either by way of St. Petersburg or through neutral parties. The Japanese are making the news; the others are sending it. This fact is a guarantee that the reports, however vague or contradictory they may be, do not exaggerate the advantage which Japan has gained. All reports of important engagements on land are so far unconfirmed. Now that the Russians have been driven from Korean waters, Japanese transports are landing thousands of troops in Korea. A large force has been sent overland to the Yalu River, and during the past week apparently several regiments have been landed in the vicinity of Possiet Bay to guard the northeastern frontier of Korea against Russian invasion from the vicinity of Vladivostok. The Japanese attack upon Port Arthur has been renewed more than once and the latest report says that the Russian vessels in the harbor have been entirely destroyed. The Japanese seem determined to take Port Arthur and it will probably be but a short time until the siege is begun. In addition to the practical reasons for desiring to control this important port, sentimental considerations may have some influence in urging the Japanese to capture Port Arthur. It will be remembered that the treaty of peace between China and Japan at the end of their war gave Japan the entire Liaotung peninsula, at the tip of which Port Arthur is situated, and that the interference of Russia compelled Japan to accept an additional cash indemnity instead of this territory. Before Japan yielded the point, she tried to get the European powers to agree that, if she could not have the Liaotung peninsula, no European power should ever secure it. But this condition was considered to be aimed indignantly at Russia and was rejected. So Japan lost this important key to Manchuria, and presently Russia seized it. It is easy to understand how Japan, with the memory of this swindle still fresh in mind, is eager to win back from Russia the territory which she has already won once from China.

Our Indian Wards.

The Week in the Far East.

It is reported that King Edward has offered to act as mediator between Russia and Japan to enable them to arbitrate their differences without further sacrifice of men and money. If so, the offer has not been accepted, and there seems little prospect in the present case that the friendly interference of any neutral power can be of much avail in bringing hostilities to an end. It is worth remembering, however, that it is not out of the range of diplomatic courtesies to make such an offer, even when hostilities are actually in progress. Hon. Oscar S. Straus, who was one of the representatives from this country at The Hague Peace Conference in 1899, says: "There is nothing now to prevent any great nation of the world from appealing to Russia and Japan and offering its good offices in bringing the present conflict before the International Court of Arbitration at the Hague for a peaceful solution." The signatory powers which joined in the establishment of the Hague tribunal expressly agreed that any one of them not interested in a dispute "shall have the right to offer good offices of mediation, even during the course of hostilities." And such an offer is not to be construed as an unfriendly act. It would seem that the Czar, as the originator of the peace conference, would think twice before offering the first conspicuous instance of a refusal to accept such friendly offices. The cynics, who believe that war is a normal activity of the human race and that the Hague tribunal and all other devices for substituting reason for force are mere sentimental moonshine, will take no little satisfaction in seeing Russia, whose ruler made the proposals for peace, so soon plunged into war. But the cause of arbitration will not suffer in the long run. The cost and horrors of war will again shock the world into a desire to find some better way of settling international difficulties. After all, war itself is the strongest argument for peace.

The work of preparation for the erection of a building for the Disciples of Christ at the St. Louis World's Fair is being actively carried forward. A slight change has been made from the plan published a few weeks ago, and the new plan will give additional room at less expense without sacrificing anything in appearance. The Exposition authorities have been most generous in assigning a conspicuous and desirable location for this building, and the funds for its erection should be promptly forthcoming. The time from now until the opening of the Exposition is short, and work upon the building should be commenced without further delay. The total amount pledged up to date is about $2,000. The committee which has charge of this enterprise is composed of J. H. Garrison, W. F. Richardson, Z. T. Sweeney, S. M. Cooper and J. H. Allen. All pledges and subscriptions should be sent to the treasurer of the committee, J. H. Allen, 106 S. Main St., St. Louis.

The trials growing out of the recent investigation of frauds in the Postal Department have progressed so far that August W. Machen, former General Superintendent of the Rural Free Delivery division, has been found guilty of conspiracy to defraud the government and has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment and to pay a fine of $10,000. The same sentence has also been passed upon George E. Lorenz, of Toledo, Ohio, and D. B. Groff, of Washington. There are other cases yet to come up for trial. The verdict upon Machen and his fellow-conspirators will be an occasion for wholesome alarm to the indicted and undicted criminals in all departments of the public service. It may be said, and it has been said, in defense of the conduct of Machen, that he did only what is a common practice in private corporations; that purchasing agents who are authorized to make purchases on a large scale expect to get a secret commission from the seller, as well as a salary from their employer. That such practices are common in the commercial world, there is every reason to believe. But this does not diminish the guilt of those who adopt the same methods in victimizing the government. It discredits their originality, but does not disprove their criminality. It compels one to look upon these post-office conspirators not as bold and inventive geniuses who have discovered a new and successful method of fraud, but as weak imitators taking their schemes of graft from the commercial world and adopting any current ideas of right and wrong which may be in harmony with their practices. The fact that such methods pervade the business world is the best reason why punishment should be meted out to those who introduce them into the public service. It is easier to detect and punish fraud in public than in private enterprises, and one of the duties which the government owes to the public is to establish and maintain right ideals of business honor.

Mr. Bartholdt, the only Republican representative from Missouri in the House of Representatives, is leading the fight against the Hepburn bill, and if the friends of the canteen decide to make a fight for its restoration he will be in the fore-front of the battle in favor of the canteen. He boasts that he will marshal the protests of three million Germans in this country against the Hepburn bill. No man who makes such a boast as that is a good American. It is hard enough at best for our Republic to assimilate the foreigners who are coming to our shores, a million a year. But the task becomes vastly harder by virtue of all such appeals to these semi-Americanized foreigners, not on the ground of their Americanism, but on the ground of their German-ism or their Irish-ism. It was an appeal to them as loyal Americans which brought the magnificent response of our German citizens to the call for volunteers to protect the Union in 1861. It is an appeal to them as Germans which Mr. Bartholdt is making now, and in so doing he is invoking the forces which make for disintegration and disunion in the nation. This is a bad business for a Congressman to be engaged in, whatever might be the merits of the cause for which he is working. "America for Americans"—that is, for those who are born Americans and for those of foreign birth who are willing to become Americans with their whole hearts.

It has been decided to pay Panama the $10,000,000 provided for by the treaty, without waiting for the transfer of the canal company's property.

Our Relation to Other Religious Bodies.

Our last article closed with the question as to whether the manifestly growing disposition of all religious bodies to recognize each other as Christians and to co-operate with each other along various lines, in which our own churches and ministers are included, is in harmony with our historic mission and the underlying principles of our movement. We promised to further consider that question in another article, and to that task we now turn our attention, reminding our readers that they are thinking out this problem with us, and that our only object is to ascertain what is truth and duty.

We have already called attention to the fact that the original impulse to our reformatory movement was the purpose to promote Christian union. The plan of doing this was to ascertain from the Scriptures, and especially from the New Testament, what was the original basis of unity among primitive Christians, and to occupy that basis. It was felt that if a number of local congregations could be called together on our common Christianity, without a sectarian or denominational name, creed, or organization, they would occupy an undenominational position, no matter how few they might be, and that they would then be in a condition to consistently plead with others to make similar sacrifices for the sake of unity. To the extent that we have been true to this ideal, there can be no question but that our position is undenominational, and that, in that particular, we occupy a unique position among religious bodies, no other one of which, so far as we are informed, started out with the distinct aim of finding and occupying common ground, on which all Christians may unite without the sacrifice of truth or conscience.

We believe the leaders in this movement, under divine guidance, found the elements of unity in the apostolic church and discovered, what was new to their generation, the New Testament basis of unity among the followers of Christ. Moreover, we believe that, in the main, the leaders in our movement—the men of clearest vision and of profoundest spiritual insight—have all along been true to these principles; but truth compels us to say that many among us, including, sometimes, leaders of large influence, have erred in their interpretation or understanding of our position, and have fallen into precisely the same erroneous position from which we were seeking to lead others, namely: the confusing of matters of opinion with matters of faith. But the truer thought and wider vision have always prevailed, and will prevail in spite of any sporadic efforts by self-appointed leaders to divert our movement from the broad lines on which it was originally projected.

If we are right, then, in our understanding of church history and of our own place among the religious forces of Protestant Christendom, here are a number of independent bodies, springing successively out of the Lutheran Reformation, all of them seeking to emphasize certain truths believed to be of more or less importance to the kingdom. Our own movement is one of these, but differing from them in the distinctness of its aims to find and occupy a common basis of fellowship on which all Christians may be united, and in its method, namely, that of returning to Christ and his Christianity, in its essential principles, as the sufficient basis for such unity. It follows, of course, from these facts, if they be facts, that we are not a church, much less "the church," nor "the Christian Church," nor "the Church of Christ," but a group of Christian Churches, or churches of Christ, occupying with more or less fidelity the New Testament basis of unity, and pleading with other Christians to assume the same basis, that we may be one, even as our Lord prayed, that the world may believe. No one of the great Protestant bodies, unless we except the Anglican Church, and its counterpart in this country, claims to be "The Church." That claim is not taken seriously by other Christians, but is regarded as arrogant, exclusive and sectarian. It grows out of a figment known as "the historic Episcopate," and is based on the idea that unity is to be secured on the basis of external organization reaching back in unbroken continuity to the apostles. Other Protestant bodies claim to be churches, using the term in an extra-Scriptural, if not anti-Scriptural sense, as indicating groups of believers holding to certain formulations of doctrine, such as the Presbyterian, or the Methodist Episcopal Churches, but do not claim to embrace the entire church of Christ on earth. This absurd claim is left to the Roman Catholic Church, and to the high church wing of the Anglican Church. No recognized leader among us has ever made such a claim, and the very spirit and aim of our movement render such arrogance impossible.

It is very clear, from these considerations, that we are not departing from the principle of our movement in seeking the closest co-operation with the other Evangelical Protestant bodies, but that, on the contrary, we would be false to the aim and object which our fathers had in view did we fail to do so. The end of Christian union, which is only, after all, a means, is the perfect co-operation of Christians for the world's conversion. To the extent that co-operation is now possible for the accomplishment of common ends, there is the same obligation to co-operate that there would be if our unity were complete. Indeed, we cannot consistently pray for a larger degree of unity until we show our sincerity by making a better use of the unity which already exists. In participating, therefore, as our churches and ministers have been doing, in such interdenominational movements as have come into existence from the union spirit, such as pulpit exchanges, evangelical alliance, Y. M. C. A., the union Sunday-school movement and the Y. P. S. C. E., we have been true to the purpose of our movement and have greatly profited thereby. Aloofness and exclusiveness are not qualities that win public favor and sympathy in our day.

The Christian Endeavor movement was one of the severest tests to which our Protestant Christianity has been put as regards its spirit of unity. It is to be regretted that some of the leading religious bodies were unable to abide this test, and have sought to withhold their young people from this great union movement in the fear, no doubt, that they might be won from their denominational allegiance by this intercourse in the larger fellowship and wider activities of the kingdom of God. It is greatly to the credit of our own movement that it was quick to see that Christian Endeavor was in perfect harmony with the spirit of unity which we were seeking to inculcate and to enlist in it heartily. This was a severer test, by far, of the reality of our devotion to Christian union than the later movement known as Church Federation, at which some of the brethren have stumbled. It has to do with the young people, in the formative period of their character, and brings them into contact with the enthusiasm of large interdenominational gatherings and under the influence of able representatives of the various religions. The latter is the voluntary agreement of the local churches in any community to co-operate, under certain simple rules and regulations, to promote civic righteousness and to provide the religious needs of the neglected, who have none to care for their souls. This local federation may co-operate with other local and state organization in a wider fellowship of service along common lines. As soon as our brethren become convinced that this method of manifesting such unity as already exists does not require any slightest modification of the principles of truths for which we plead, but would give us larger opportunity for applying them, they will enter enthusiastically into this form of co-operation and help to guide its future course, as they should do.

All this flows from the fact that we who are urging the Reformation of the nineteenth century, and those who represent older reformatory movements, are not enemies, but friends and allies, having the common aim of advancing the kingdom of God, owning a common Lord, Jesus of Nazareth, and seeking to bring the whole earth into subjection to Him. It is God's will that we recognize our kinship as brethren.

ren, that we each be true to the light as we see the light, until Christ, by the magnetic power of His sublime personality, shall draw us into that perfect unity with Himself and the Father and with each other, by which the world is to be brought under His benignant reign.

The Flood-Tide.

It is well enough to criticize jerky religion and to urge that the manifestations of spiritual life ought to be continuous and not spasmodic, but the fact remains that there are times and seasons for special efforts, special observances and special manifestations of zeal. It is well enough to say that we ought to be interested in missions all the year round, but now, on the first Lord's day in March, is the time when the missionary spirit of the Disciples of Christ ought to reach its high tide.

The moon pulls constantly upon the earth, but the tides answer this constant force with their ebb and flow. The Spirit of God draws upon the hearts of His people unceasingly, but the tides of Christian activity rise and fall. Yet it is always flood-tide somewhere in the ocean; and Christian zeal and energy ought always to be at flood in some department of the Christian life.

Just now, at the season set apart by general agreement among the Disciples of Christ as the time for the offering for foreign missions, our zeal should be at high tide on the subject of world-wide evangelization.

For weeks and months we have been preparing for this day of the March offering. Information about our foreign work has been published by press and pulpit. And how eloquent and thrilling are even the bare facts of missions, stripped of all rhetorical appeal! The principles of missions have been expounded, the authority of missions has been proclaimed, the needs of missions have been unfolded, our own personal and individual responsibility for missions has been demonstrated.

Now let us act.

Saving Faith.

We publish this week an article on "The Faith that Saves," from the pen of the venerable Dr. Theodore Cuyler. Dr. Cuyler is now over eighty-two years old, but his spiritual eyes are not dimmed. It is gratifying to note his clear emphasis upon faith as trust leading to obedience. The Disciples of Christ have always insisted that faith is practical, not theoretical or emotional. They have, from the first, protested against two things: first, against making faith the intellectual acceptance of an elaborate system of theological propositions; and second, against the plan of leaving a penitent sinner groping in the dark after a "sense of forgiveness" and agonizing in uncertainty until he should "feel" that he had been accepted by God. It has been the strong point of our evangelism that we have appealed to the will. We have insisted that saving faith is such a belief of the testimony about Christ and such a confidence in him as leads a man to obey his commands and trust the promise of God for the rewards.

We have sometimes been accused of making faith purely intellectual. No charge could be farther from the fact. We have made it practical—a belief of testimony, to be sure, but such a belief of testimony as calls for definite action in obedience to specific commands. The wonderful success of our evangelistic efforts, from the days of Walter Scott's great crusade in Ohio to those of our latest "big meeting," has been due, first of all to the blessing of God, and second to the fact that we have confronted the world, Christian and non-Christian alike, with a definite program of action, as clear and definite as a military order and as authoritative as the word of Christ could make it.

May our evangelism never become a whit less positive than it has been in the past. And let us remember, too, that the practical and active side of faith is not exhausted in the process of conversion. The saving faith which leads the sinner to the definite acts of repentance and baptism, must continue to lead the convert into the equally definite acts of loving service and spiritual living to which our Lord's teaching points and which loyalty to him requires.

Questions and Answers.

How were men saved under the Old Testament dispensation?

By faith. See Hebrews 11. By the grace of God, who mercifully remembered the frailties of men, and made allowance for the incomplete revelation of His will. "The times of ignorance God winked at." Acts 17:30.

Is it a Christian duty or are we commanded to pray the Lord's Prayer?

The Lord's Prayer might well be used much more constantly than it is both in public and in private worship. It should not be used, however, as in obedience to a command, but because it is a true expression of the attitude of the soul toward God. The first requisite of prayer is sincerity. It is a mockery for one to address God as "Our Father" who does not consider Him as a father; to pray "Thy kingdom come," if the advancement of the kingdom is not really a desire of the heart; or to repeat the words "forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," unless one has a forgiving spirit. But it is the duty of the Christian to be in such a spiritual condition that these petitions may be employed honestly and sincerely. The Lord's Prayer was not given as a form of words which anyone is commanded to repeat, but was given in answer to the request of the disciples, who said: "Lord, teach us how to pray."

1. Why was the day of worship changed from the Sabbath to Sunday? 2. Is it true that Catholics made this change? 3. By whose authority was the change made?

1. "The day of worship" was never changed from the Sabbath to Sunday. The Sabbath was not primarily a day of worship, but a day of rest. In later Jewish times it came to be observed as a time for religious assemblies, but this was incidental. The chief feature of the day as originally instituted was abstinence from work. See Ex. 20:8-11. The primary object of the Lord's day is not rest, but worship. A certain amount of rest is necessary to give opportunity for worship, but this is not the essential thing. The observance of the first day of the week as the day of Christian worship began in the earliest days of the apostolic church. The observance of the Sabbath by Christians gradually ceased as Christianity broke away from the leading-strings of Judaism.

2. The first day of the week had been observed as the day of Christian worship for three centuries before the Roman Catholic Church came into existence.

3. The beginning of the observance of the Lord's day and the disuse of the Sabbath took place during the life and under the leadership of the apostles. For further light on this subject see Dungan's "Sabbath or Lord's Day, Which?"

1. How can we furnish pastors for weak congregations that can pay only $50 to $150 a year for quarter time? When a young man spends six years in college, he can't afford to preach for $400 a year, and if all go to college where will we get the $400 men?

2. Does not the educational standard discourage many from entering the ministry who otherwise might do good?

1. There is probably not a congregation in the United States which is not able to pay more than $50 a year for the support of the Lord's work. Some of them will not pay more, but it is not lack of ability that hinders them. Possibly if we had a better supply of properly trained young preachers we would not have so many $50 and $100 churches.

2. Apparently the educational standard does not operate strongly as a discouragement. About 28 per cent of the Christian preachers in Missouri have ever attended college. This includes those who have attended one year or less. Evidently the superabundance of educated preachers cannot be held responsible for the shortage of $400 men.

[We do not belittle the difficulties or the importance of the country church, but in this connection mean only to indicate that excess of education among the ministry is not the cause of the trouble. One of our strongest writers is preparing for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a series of articles on "The Country Church."]

Down on Biscayne Bay.

Florida is Uncle Sam's forefinger thrust down into the southern seas as if to test their temperature or point the way to perpetual summer. Dade County, including this Biscayne Bay region, is the Riviera of America. In climate for the winter it is perhaps unexcelled, if, indeed, it be equalled in the United States. Clouds are the exception; sunshine is the rule. And yet it is a sunshine tempered and toned by a breeze from the ocean that has lost its chill in passing over the gulf stream which comes nearest the eastern coast at this point. It is the land of the cocoanut palm, the mango, the banana, the pineapple, all the citrus fruits, but especially the grape fruit and the lemon. But to the visitor from the north where blizzards rage, it is the eternal sunshine and balmy atmosphere that constitute the chief attraction. In scenic attractions it is not equal to Southern California, or Colorado, or some other parts of the United States. But this beautiful bay, with the outlying line of keys, possesses a perpetual fascination. Whether one floats upon its surface in a row-boat, glides over its crystal waters in a sail-boat, or sitting on the veranda, watches the white sails of the fishing fleet or an occasional Key West, Nassau or Havana steamer as it follows the channel just inside the keys, it is a panorama of changing scenes and an unending source of interest. And then there are the cocoanut palm, the date palm and the stately royal palm, here and there, which add an attractive feature to this southern landscape, so that, in the absence of cloud-caped mountains and deep gorges, this region is not wanting in a beauty and attractiveness all its own.

Last evening, just as the round, red sun was going down behind the tall pines, we landed from our row-boat in which we had been rowing and idly floating on the bay and reading—just we two—for a few hours. Happy is the author whose book is read under such circumstances! As we walked westward toward the house and gazed upon the tall, green pines silhouetted against a golden and glowing sky, we thought that the sunset, after all, excelled in splendor and magnificence, even a sunrise over the ocean. But this morning, waking early, we had occasion to watch again, as we have often done, the breaking light of the east and the sun, at length, coming out of his tabernacle rejoicing as a strong man to run a race, and kindling his morning fires on the face of the deep, and we decided that they were the two masterpieces of the same great Artist, equal in perfection and unapproachable by any human hand. There is a blending of colors here, between the sunset and dark, that is indescribable. The whole landscape seems to be bathed in a sort of afterglow—a golden twilight—which softens every feature and woos the soul to meditation and to silence. In such a moment one who has the sense of beauty and the spirit of reverence involuntarily lifts his heart in gratitude to God for His beautiful world, which He has filled with His glory.

This land of sunshine and flowers and tropical fruits was once the home of the red man. The brave and warlike Seminoles were once the masters of these hammocks, savannas, glades, lakes and rivers. It was a bloody war, lasting through many years, that finally subdued these fierce warriors and transferred them to other lands further west. We have just read Kirk Munroe's "Through Swamp and Glade," a graphic and thrilling story of the Seminole war, which shows at what tremendous sacrifice of blood and treasure this peninsula has been won from the Indians and made the home of the white man and the abode of civilization. It shows, too, alas! how the white man, sometimes without the knowledge of the government, sometimes by the connivance of those in authority, and sometimes by the representatives of the government themselves, deceived and despoiled the Indians and made enemies of them instead of friends. There can be no doubt that many of our Indian wars have been due to the avarice and greed of the white man, who has coveted his land and has not been scrupulous about how he got possession of it. This fact is brought out very clearly in Mr. Munroe's work mentioned above. By the way, Mr. Munroe is our near neighbor, owning one of the handsomest places on the Bay, where he lives in a beautiful orange grove and does his literary work. He and his charming wife, who is the daughter of Mrs. Amelia Barr, the popular author, dispense a wide hospitality to their friends and to their numerous visitors. Mr. Munroe has recently returned from a trip around the world, but found no place he likes so well as Biscayne Bay.

It is a beautiful drive from Miami, the present terminus of the Florida East Coast Railway, and the most southern railway station in the United States, to Cocoanut Grove, and there is a stream of tourists from the Royal Palm, Hotel Biscayne, and the other hotels of that growing young city, down to our picturesque village scattered along the Bay front. Among those calling yesterday were Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Colby, or Macatawa, whom many of our readers will remember, who called for us during our absence down the Bay. They are on a cruising expedition with a party of friends among the keys of Southern Florida. The cold winter at the north has driven a large number of people into this southern clime, and many of them are so charmed with the climate that they are inquiring for real estate. We tarry here yet awhile longer and then we hope to cross the peninsula to the gulf side to attend the Florida State Convention at Tampa, about the middle of March. We are hoping to hear good news from the March offering for foreign missions, and from all branches of the general work. Great events are transpiring in the east, and great changes are impending in the political map of the world. But the one certain event of the future, amid all these uncertainties, is the triumph of the kingdom of God which is the kingdom of righteousness and peace.

Notes and Comments.

In answering the question, "Will men ever succeed in aerial flight?" the Advance suggests that some popular preachers have already succeeded admirably. But Prof. Langley tells us that the balloon-and-gas method of aerial navigation will not meet the requirements. If that is true, the aforesaid popular preachers are ruled out.

"The Church of This World," which was organized in Kansas City some years ago, has collapsed. Its promoters doubtless meant well. The name sounded so splendidly practical and seemed to promise so much of human helpfulness, instead of the old-fashioned moonshine of ritual and dogma! But, as the event proved, there is nothing more impractical than a church founded upon anything less enduring than God's truth and less sublime than the person of Christ. The church, like the sabbath, was made for man and not man for the church. Let it be practical and minister to human needs. But the greatest of human needs is the need of close touch with things divine. The church that grovels cannot help men. It cannot even keep itself alive.

Here are some thrilling reports from the watchmen on Zion's walls. Four telegrams were received at our office on Monday morning, as follows:

Charleston, Ill., Feb. 23.—One hundred and eight additions to date. A Presbyterian preacher resigned a good pulpit to come. Great interest shown; splendid pastor-general.—ALLEN WILSON, evangelist.

Wheeling W. Va., Feb. 28.—The Clarence Mitchell meetings continue with crowded houses; 185 additions up to date.—J. W. UNDERWOOD, pastor.

Jacksonville, Ill., Feb. 28.—Scoville and Helm here; 24 added to-night, 27 last night, 109 in five days, 204 in twenty days. Will continue a few days.—R. F. THRAPPE.

Portsmouth, Ohio, Feb. 28.—Harlow-Ridenour meeting closed to-night with 301 additions in four weeks.—GEORGE P. TAUBMAN.

Here are seven hundred and ninety-eight additions in four meetings, none of which has been in progress longer than four weeks and three of which are still continuing.

Faithfulness, Fruitfulness, Fullness

By F. D. Power

All who attended the Detroit conventions will remember this motto of the Christian women. Like all their watchwords—"The Love of Christ Constraineth us," "50,000 Women," "$175-000!"—these three words stirred us. Their application is as fitting for the F. C. M. S. as for the C. W. B. M. No better motto could be conceived, not only for Christian women, but for Christian men; not only for our guidance in the great obligation to work for missions, but in all the various duties of church life and individual Christian life. Some one has said a missionary must have four passions—a passion for truth, a passion for Christ, a passion for the souls of men, and a passion for self-sacrifice. But is it not true for every one who would adorn the gospel of God our Savior these four passions are necessary? "The love of Christ constraineth us" not to give only, but to live; not to pray only, but to labor; not to worship only, but to walk in the ways of righteousness; not to love our Lord only, but to love men and women for whom Christ died; not to accept Jesus only as our personal Savior, but to be faithful in his service, fruitful in good works for others, full of all spiritual and holy things.

First, faithfulness. Here is the supreme test of any life. No soul can be fruitful or full unless first of all faithful. The faithful in Christ Jesus are the fruitful, the full. "Well done, good and faithful servant." "Be thou faithful unto death and thou shalt receive a crown of life." It is "the faithful and wise steward," faithful over a few things, who is made lord over many things. This is the great source of our strength in God—his faithfulness. "I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation." "I will make known thy faithfulness unto all generations." "Thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds." "All thy commandments are done in faithfulness." "All thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth." "Who is like unto thee and thy faithfulness round about thee?"

What does it mean? Why, that God performs his word. He said the world should not again be destroyed by flood and for a token he would put his bow in the heavens, and it is so. He promised his Son, and through his prophets foretold his birth, life, sufferings, death, resurrection and ascension. His word was faithful. He assured his people of temporal blessings, spiritual strength, divine direction and help in time of trial. Not one word has failed. What a stay! "Faithful is he that calleth you." Faint and weary you may be, but God faints not. Fail utterly and come to naught all your plans, but he fails not. He is faithful to perform and perfect all his promises. "Janet," said the old Scotch minister to the Christian woman of great faith, "Suppose, after all, God were to let you drop into hell?" "Even as he likes, but if he does, he will lose more than I'll do!" True witness. God cannot break his word.

Now something of the same faithfulness heaven demands of us. God says: "Go into all the world and preach the gospel unto every creature." Are we faithful? "Give, and it shall be given unto you." "Let your light shine." "Be diligent to make your calling and election sure." Are we doing these things? One of the great remedies of our modern era of fads and breakfast foods is "the rest cure." If there ever was a preposterous humbug it is the rest cure. Patients are exhorted to sit still, to seek power through repose. Absolute inaction is nature's sweet restorer. Dolce far niente ad libitum! Why, we have a class of people wandering up and down the earth commonly called "tramps" who are taking this cure. We have thousands in our churches that are being treated by it. The work cure is far more invigorating. The cure for many an ailment treated with drugs, for pessimism, for suicide, for melancholy, for faithlessness, selfishness and worldliness, for latitudinarianism and spiritual decay, is work—simple, wholesome, old-fashioned, Christian work. Lend a hand. Get out and hustle. Live not to be ministered unto, but to minister. Yonder are millions of men and women that are without Christ, homes that are no homes, hearts that are sore and weary with a hurt and a weariness you have never known.

Now faithfulness begets fruitfulness. Fruitfulness is opposed to an empty, barren, unproductive profession of religion. "I know thy works that thou hast a name to live and art dead." "I am the vine, ye are the branches. As the branch can not bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye except ye abide in me." The love of Christ constrains us to abide in him, to be united with him; and the life of Christ in the Christian makes him fruitful in every good word and work. "If these things be in you and abound they make you that you be neither barren nor unfruitful." Every man or woman who has a passion for Christ, who is faithful to Christ, must have a passion for Christ's work, for missions; must carry the unsaved world as a burden; must be moved with a mighty zeal for souls in the home field and the foreign field; must be constrained by the love of Christ to enlist all Christians round about him in the crusade to bring the kingdoms of this world into our Lord's Kingdom. Fruitful, that is what we would be. Like a tree, an olive tree, a date palm, a tree planted by the rivers of water, a genuine old tree, munificent to the lofty and lowly, yielding fruit to prince and peasant, for centuries shaking down its ripe mercies, one generation coming, another going, and still its fruit falling, bearing fruit with all its might, never stinting itself, never cheating its owner, standing on its rocky or sandy bed, and pouring down fatness in the midst of dreariness and desolation. Fruitfulness. Fruitful in every good work.

Fullness is the effect of faithfulness and fruitfulness. The love of Christ constrains us here also. Fullness is the state of being filled so as to have no part vacant—completeness. In Christ it pleased the Father that all fullness should dwell, and of his fullness have we all received, even grace for grace. United with him we are made partakers of the divine nature; and this fullness is the need of the whole perishing race of humanity.

The church can never exhibit these three conditions which constitute her "the fullness of him that filleth all in all," until she rises to the supreme duty of world-wide missions. She must earnestly desire that God should illumine the world with the radiance of his glory, that all nations may come and worship him. She must pray that God would forgive the unbelief, and so enlarge the hearts and kindle the zeal of her people, that they would fervently desire the salvation of all men and diligently labor to accomplish it. She must night and day humbly and importunately beseech her Heavenly Father to make every mission station to be a center of light and a channel of life; to inflame the missionaries with zeal and love and grant them guidance and protection; to send forth many who are wise to win souls; and to give all Christian people a willing heart to sustain and forward the work of missions for the glory of his name.

Christ for the world we sing!
The world to Christ we bring,
With loving zeal;
The poor, and them that mourn,
The faint and overborne,
Sin-sick and sorrow-worn,
Whom Christ doth heal.

Christ for the world we sing!
The world to Christ we bring,
With fervent prayer;
The wayward and the lost,
By restless passions tossed,
Redeemed at countless cost,
From dark despair.

Christ for the world we sing!
The world to Christ we bring,
With one accord;
With us the works to share,
With us reproach to dare,
With us the cross to bear,
For Christ our Lord.

Christ for the world we sing!
The world to Christ we bring,
With joyful song;
The new-born souls, whose days,
Reclaimed from error's ways,
Inspired with hope and praise,
To Christ belong.

The Bible-School the Supreme Opportunity of the Church.

By H. D. Williams.

Three great opportunities are passing by the church of to-day. They are the opportunity to convert the heathen, the opportunity to unite its own forces in the "one body," and the opportunity to teach Christ to the young. These opportunities are represented by missions, union and the Bible-school—these three movements, but the greatest of these is the Bible-school. Why?

1. Because the Bible-school opportunity once well improved, it follows as night the day, that missions and union will also be seized.

The great drawback to the onward march of Christianity is a divided and a superficial church. This divided and superficial church is perpetually too much "pulpit thunder" and too little real teaching of the word of God and its profound doctrine and sublime ideals. The church will never seize missions and union as it should, until it has first seized Christ with a firmer grip. That the church of the future may lay hold on Christ with that firmer grip, it must be taught until it is rooted and grounded in the doctrines and ideals of the New Testament. The Bible-school is the opportunity for uniting and deepening the church for triumphant service. Let not the pulpit be disparaged; it must ever remain the supreme agency for the promotion of the kingdom. But it needs the influence and the assistance of the best Bible-school the church can maintain.

2. Because Christianity works by impression rather than by repression.

The repressive or negative conception of Christianity is all too common. The great body of the church yet looks upon Christianity as a restraint. To follow Christ consists in not doing positive evil. This reduces God to nothing but a judge, Christ a chief of police, and the ministry his policemen. It turns service into slavery, and the free-will offering into an extorted fine. This error is largely to blame for a worldly and fruitless church.

The rational, the apostolic, the Christ method of dealing with man is that of impression. Christ seeks to capture and use men by impressing them with the sublimity and divinity of his cause. His call to men is not to "keep out of evil," but rather, "come to me in this good work;" not "tie yourself down," but "let yourself out;" not "empty your life of evil," but "fill your life with good;" not "fear," but hope;" not "hate," but love;" not "doubt," but "believe."

But if this larger and richer conception of Christian life is ever to fill the church, it must go in through the Bible-school. This is true because, first, the ideal demands teaching, second, the young are fully and freely susceptible to it. In the measure that the method of Christianity is impression rather than repression—in that measure is the Bible-school a great opportunity for the church to-day.

3. Because the Bible-school as it is, educates and trains the best workers.

Out of 160 leading workers in 16 leading Protestant churches, all but eight were trained and converted in the Bible-school before they were 25 years old.

When we consider how inefficient the Bible-school now is as compared to what it might and ought to be, it surely must be evident that it offers the church the supreme opportunity of the hour.

4. Because the Bible-school demands a working church.

The problem of the church is how to engage every member in distinctively organic Christian service. The Bible-school offers the work. Christian profession ought to mean working with the church in the supreme work of teaching the word. It will mean that some day, and the church member who will not work in the Bible-school, will be considered as a heathen.

Of course the Bible-school in any church is big enough an undertaking to demand the energies of the entire church. The school needs the work of the entire church, and the whole church needs the work of the school.

5. Because the Bible-school offers the best means of infusing religion into the home.

In twenty years of careful observation during as many years of pastoral work, the writer has found that drawing the entire family into the Bible-school and getting it deeply interested in the work, generally makes the home religious. This is the only way he has ever been able to induce families to introduce family worship and have a regular time for Bible study.

As yet the church has not got down to business in running the Bible-school. It is only playing at the work.

Give the Sad World Your Sympathy!

By Thomas Curtis Clark.

The world has enough of your sighs and your moans,

Laments that it's all going wrong;

What the poor world needs is a cheery smile,

A tender and heartfelt song;

Its bruised, aching heart is breaking with grief

For the errors its own eyes can see;

So, keeping your sighs and your cold, bitter moans,

Give the sad world your sympathy!

The world has enough of the critic's harsh tones;

His merciless sword has for years

Stricken deep to the heart of the world's struggling form,

And has brought her to groans and to tears;

What the world needs from you is a comforting word,

A tear for its deep misery;

So, keeping your taunts and your words, anger-born,

Give the sad world your sympathy!

The Up-to-Date Church and Foreign Missions.

By Edward B. Bagby.

The dominate thought in the teaching of Jesus was the kingdom of God. The chief business of the church is to bring to earth this "reign of God over loving hearts and obedient wills." When we have the ideal church, the kingdom of God will not be far off. The up-to-date church is the nearest approach to this ideal.

1. The up-to-date church will have an up-to-date preacher. He will not be one who is satisfied to survey his parish from the top of the church's belfry, but will rather say, "The world is my parish." He will not be content to be down comfortably with the sheep in the fold, but will look for the one that is lost and say, "Other sheep have I that are not of this fold; them also must I bring." He will not be satisfied to preach a half-hearted sermon on Foreign Mission Day, and take a basket collection, but will systematically, enthusiastically prepare for the day and then call for an offering. Every prayer will include the petition, "Thy kingdom come," and every sermon will have reference to the doing of the will of God in all the earth.

2. The up-to-date church will have up-to-date members. They will not be a hundred years behind the times, and say, "If God wants the heathen saved he will save them," nor fifty years behind and say, "We have heathen at home," nor five or ten years, and say, "We have a debt, or must shingle the roof, etc." They will have an interest in missions that is vital, not formal and mechanical, but living and breathing. They will read the religious papers, and look first for the news of the progress of Christ's kingdom. They will regard the sermons on missions as the best sermons; their heads will be full of missionary intelligence, their hearts with love for the missionaries and their work, and their hands busy to earn a support for laborers in the world-wide harvest field. Their interest, too, will be not theoretical, but practical. They will not say, "What a grand thing it is to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," and then keep their money in their pockets. The milk of human kindness needs not so much to be diluted with the tears of sentimental pity, as to be enriched with the gold of self-sacrificing offerings.

The interest will be joyful. The first Lord's day in March will be the happiest day in the year. The members will be sharers in the joy of the missionaries, the happiest people in the world.

When all the preachers shall be up-to-date preachers, and all the members up-to-date members, and have an interest vital and practical, we shall not give grudgingly and of necessity a paltry $250,000, but gloriously, hilariously, our millions. Then the Lord will love us.

The Faith That Saves By T. L. Cuyler, D.D.

"When I was in college," said the Rev. Dr. B——, "one of the professors tried hard to explain faith to me. But it was a muddle until I came and trusted my soul to Jesus Christ. When I did it I understood it." It is the simplicity of faith that often puzzles people. They are discussing a doctrine, when they ought to be doing an act. They worry their brains when they ought to be yielding their hearts.

Faith is sometimes defined as an assent to the truth of the gospel which God has given us. But this is an intellectual act that is not sufficient to save a soul. Intellectual belief in the gospel is entertained by millions without the slightest penitence for sin or the least step towards following Christ. There are plenty of intellectual believers in that world of woe where "the devils also believe—and tremble!" Faith has also been defined as "taking God at his word." A very important mental act is this, too; but does any "word" of our heavenly Father save our souls? Did the apostles ever preach "believe the word and be saved?"

Paul and Silas were confronted by the mightiest question that ever agitates a human soul, when that poor jailer of Philippi lay trembling before them. They did not stop to expound a doctrine; they enforced a deed; they did not point to a system of truth, but to a personal Savior. To an almighty Person, a loving, compassionate Person, to a divine Person whose atoning blood cleanseth from sin. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Not in Christianity, but on Jesus Christ. This is what they told the jailer.

Mark that little and yet supremely great word on. It is not enough to believe in Christ. Millions of unconverted people believe in Jesus, just as they believe in Howard as a noble philanthropist, and in Washington as a pure patriot, and in Newton as a profound philosopher. But they do not trust their souls to Jesus. They do not rest on him for salvation; they do not build their characters on him as the only foundation.

One of the survivors from the terrible burning of a great hotel tells us that when he was driven back by the flames in the hall, he seized the escape-rope in his bedroom, and from an upper story he lowered himself through the smoke down to the sidewalk. He had seen that rope before, but had felt no need of it. He had a good opinion of the strength of the rope, but it was only an opinion; he put it to the test when he swung out of the window and trusted his life to it. Now that was a saving faith; he let go of everything else and committed his whole weight to those well-braided strands of hemp. And when a human soul lets go of every other reliance in the wide universe and lays hold of the sin-atoning Redeemer for salvation, that soul "believes on Christ." He entrusts himself to Jesus for pardon, for acceptance with God, for grace, for strength, for guidance and for a full salvation.

Some anxious inquirer who reads this article may say that if Paul told the jailer to believe on Jesus Christ, the Apostle Peter had previously told a company of sinners who were "pricked in their hearts" that their first duty was to "repent." Very true; and my friend, it is your duty also if you would have a new life here and an eternal life hereafter. But just what is genuine and scriptural and effectual repentance? Is it sorrow for sin? Yes; but it is a vast deal more than that. It is the act of a soul that, with not only a sorrow for sin but hatred of sin, turns from it to God with an earnest endeavor to obey and follow Jesus Christ. Evangelical repentance and faith go together. They are inseparable. They are the two halves of one globe. Sorrow, shame, self-reproach will all end in nothing unless you lay hold of Him who alone can give you the new life, the new character, and the new conduct. Is the Holy Spirit working upon your heart? Yes; and you must move whither he points; he is pressing you right towards Christ.

Repentance is more than a mere feeling; it is an act. Saving faith is more than an opinion or a good resolution, or a devout purpose. It is the act of yielding your heart up to the sin-atoning and loving Savior, and joining your soul to Him as your Redeemer and Lord. When Jesus Christ called Peter and James and John, he said to them, "Follow me!" They did not sit down and cry; they did not consult anybody; they did not promise the Christ that they would at some future day obey him. Straightway they left their nets and followed him. There, my friend, is the example for you. Begin to do the first thing that the Spirit working on your conscience bids you do. When you honestly take any step hither in abandoning a sin, or in doing a duty, and do this simply to please Jesus Christ, then conversion has begun. You have changed masters. To be willing to trust on Christ, and to go with Christ even for a single important step is the beginning of a genuine Christian life.

Have you a little faith? Use what you have and pray for more. Christ will help you when you begin to follow him, as a child that is learning how to walk. Don't be satisfied with half-way work; no number of half Christians can make a whole one. Make a clean break with your old sins and old self, and lay firm hold on the almighty Savior. There was a good deal of pith in the answer of an humble servant-maid, who, when applying for admission to the church, was asked by her pastor what evidence she had of her conversion? Her reply was, "Well,—for one thing, I sweep now under the rugs and the door-mats." The fatal mischief with some professors of religion is that they have left a sad amount of sin and selfishness under the door-mats. "Faith without works is dead." The only proof you can give that you are trusting on Christ and following Christ is that you begin to keep Christ's commandments.

The best flower of grace is the one that scatters its seeds farthest.

There are some sins that are transgressions against God. There are some sins that are transgressions against love. But there are other sins that are sins against the happiness of others, and you ought to add that standard to your measurement. Only a rift, but where is all the music? Only a fly, but what of all the ointment? In the name of all we love and all who love us, may God forgive us for our little sins.—Morrison.

A DR.'S. FOOD

Found a Food That Lifted Him out of Trouble.

The food experience of a doctor experimenting with himself is worth knowing. He says:

"I had acid dyspepsia since I have any knowledge, from eight years old I know.

"It worked down from stomach to intestines, locating at the umbilicus in enteritis until six years ago the agony every few days was something terrible. I have walked the floor for hours unable to eat or digest if I should eat.

"Medicine would not relieve me at all. Four years ago I began the use of Grape-Nuts, and since the first dish I have never had an attack of the old trouble. I take four tablespoonfuls once a day with my supper which is composed only of whole wheat bread and the Grape-Nuts.

"The wonderful part of my case is that I have never had an attack or even any of the dreadful symptoms since the very first meal of Grape-Nuts. Most of my patients know how suddenly and promptly Grape-Nuts cured me and I have prescribed the food with good results in many cases." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Grape-Nuts is regularly prescribed in place of medicine by many physicians for stomach or intestinal trouble, lack of nourishment, brain-fag and nervous prostration. The result usually shows immediate improvement and a speedy, complete cure.

Ten days' trial of Grape-Nuts in place of starchy food works wonders. "There's a reason."

Faith Helped by the Recovered Gospel.

By Ernest Alfonso Orr.

I have just read two great little books. The one is "The Recovery and Restatement of the Gospel," by Loran David Osborn and the other, "Helps to Faith," by J. H. Garrison. Both strengthen faith and confirm hope because both give a larger and a more real vision of Christianity. Jesus of Nazareth is to-day crowned Lord by the scribe as never before. He is the magnet that is drawing the thought and the heart of the Christian world together.

These books are both inspired by the same practical motive, the unity of Christendom and the victory of Christ by a recovery of and a return to the original gospel. They will prove to be medicine to all, and they are needed by none more than by those who are making "The Plea" for the union of Christendom. The former will comfort by the thought that the honest thinkers and the truly pious of every school are thinking, praying and working for the answer of our Lord's prayer "that they may all be one" and for the restoration of the gospel in its primitive simplicity and power. It will tempt some who are lacking in spiritual balance and Christian charity to say, "Did not the Nineteenth Century Reformers tell you so" and "Have not we been trying, for three quarters of a century, to get these ideas into your heads?" "This is nothing new to us and we knew you would have to come to it." That is, instead of praising God that "the Spirit of Truth" is rediscovering and showing the church the things of Christ, and thus uniting Christendom and glorifying Christ, some will continue to cultivate sectarian jealousy and strife by iterating and vociferating "we did it" and "I told you so."

But "Helps to Faith" will save us from this sin and "Frae many a blunder free us." Like the former book, it is spiritual in the best sense of that term. It is not sentimental gush, but what appeals to and draws out what is best in man. It is a book to be taken to heart by those who are afraid of "the spirit of the age." For it helps to a vision and a faith that lift above such fear. It everywhere breathes the spirit of the beatitudes, and will prick the inflated pride of the undogmatic dogmatist who fights the infallible dogmas of the infallible creeds by the infallible dogmas of the creedless sect. It will certainly prove a boon to both those who infallibly know the truth, and those who want to know the infallible truth. For if they do not get the truth they may get what is better for them, while they are in search of the truth, the Spirit of Truth.

The recovery and restatement of the gospel is an honest attempt to do just what the title promises. It is a fine piece of historical and constructive work; and it blazes the path along which, as the author himself says, Christian union is surely coming.

Helps to Faith is homiletical and practical but none the less truly constructive. It helps faith by removing the obstacles to reconstruction as well as by letting the gospel shine by its own glorious light.

The former book makes one rejoice that the Christian world is rediscovering and restating the gospel; and the latter, makes one glory that the gospel is found and that its right construction is assured by the Spirit of Truth who is leading the church. Both save from the sin spoken of by the latter (page 207): "Not to know the age in which we live, not to understand the deepest currents of thought along which the Spirit of God is moving, is the very sin for which Jesus rebuked the religious people of his time."

Our Lord's Command and Our Brother's Call.

By Robert Graham Frank.

The task given to the apostles by Christ in the Great Commission was one of gigantic proportions, but it was not the greatness of the work so much as the assumed lack of demand for it that overwhelmed them. Christ said, "Go," but no one was heard to say "Come." It was as if a general commanded his army to go forward in the face of a seemingly insurmountable wall, and this, too, when no one was calling for deliverance. "Who," they might have asked, "will hear our story?" They were to begin in Jerusalem; in the city which had mocked, scourged and crucified the Christ whom they are now commanded to preach. They most naturally assumed that they were being sent to deliver a message which no one wished to hear.

But their love for their Master was strong, and they heeded his command. In Jerusalem they begin to preach Christ. I am of the opinion that the eager attention and the appealing question of the pentecostal audience surprised no one more than they did Peter and his fellow-apostles. He was presenting, as an object of love, Christ to the men who had hounded him to his death. "Will they wish to hear again of this Nazarene of whom they thought themselves rid?" must have been the question which crowded itself before each utterance of Peter's sermon.

But there were hungry hearts in that throng waiting for some one to break to them the bread of life. The audible voice of the Master gave the command. The inaudible voice of the hungry world gave the call.

Paul and Silas were at Troas. For the second time they had traversed Asia, and now looked with wondering gaze over the waves of the Ægean. Asia they knew, and to its calling thousands they longed to go again with their message of hope, "but the spirit of Jesus suffered them not." They had come down to the sea, and were not permitted to turn back. They were being driven into the vast and, to them, unknown continent of Europe. How strange it must have seemed to them! Asia was calling for them, but no voice had sent its appeal to them from beyond the sea. "Why go where no one calls?" The question was no sooner in their minds than the answer came. "There was a man of Macedonia, standing, beseeching him and saying, Come over into Macedonia and help us." Is there no one beyond the Sea who is longing to hear of the Saviour? The man of Macedonia answers the question. Again the Lord's command is supplemented by the brother's call. These two scenes are typical. From the "mount called Olivet" the church hears the command and then stands wonderingly, wishing to know who cares to hear the gospel which it is commanded to preach. But inactivity can not long be justified on the ground that no one calls for those whom Christ has sent, for the call always supplements the command. No one goes to do what Christ commands that he does not meet those who want to hear his message and receive his help. Peter always finds an audience, Philip always meets the eunuch and Paul always finds a heart which God had opened.

There never was a day in which the church had no calls to service. There is no heart so cultured or so depraved that it does not welcome with eagerness him who comes in the spirit of Christ with his message of hope and deliverance. To-day these calls are coming from every land and from millions of longing hearts. More now than at any previous day is it true that,

"From Greenland's icy mountains,
From India's coral strand;
From Africa's sunny fountains,
Roll down their golden sand;
From many an ancient river,
From many a palmy plain,
They call us to deliver
Their land from error's chain."

The "Go ye into all the world" is supplemented by "Come ye into all the world." There is no home, hamlet, town, city or continent from which this call does not come to-day. The church, with the command of its Lord saying, "Go," and the call of the world saying "Come," must heed. And it is only necessary that the church hear in order to heed. "I do not believe in missions" is not necessarily the word of an unChristian heart; it is more frequently the result of deafness. No man who loves Christ and his fellow men can hear the imperative command of the one and the beseeching call of the other and still refuse to go.

Let all pulpits ring with the command of Christ and sigh with the calls of a lost world, and Christian hearts will hear and Christian love will answer in streams of gold.

A Dozen Things to be Remembered.

Concerning the offering for Foreign Missions, March 6, please remember the following:

1. If your church did not give last year, it ought to be enlisted now. This should be done to help save it from present weakness and future extinction. Give and live; deny and die.

2. If your church did give and did not reach its apportionment, it ought to make provision for at least that amount. A mere "basket collection" is not worthy of a church or so great a cause. A thorough canvass of the whole church should be made. Each member should be asked for a definite amount.

3. That every dollar raised on the first Sunday in March should be sent for this divine enterprise. Double your apportionment if possible. It is better not to permit any part of the offering to be diverted in any way. Every dollar raised on that day should go for this cause.

4. That if the churches, as churches, give $100,000 on March 6, we are sure of reaching a quarter of a million dollars this year. And what an insignificant sum for so great a people! It is less than twenty-five cents per member.

5. That we are growing in numbers and wealth, and if there is not a corresponding growth in liberality and in the missionary spirit, our numbers and wealth will prove to be our humiliation. Why all our numbers and wealth if they are not used for the furtherance of the gospel?

6. That only 2,825 churches gave to this cause last year. Some regard this as the most humiliating fact in the history of our people. A church certainly has no apology for an existence which does not have fellowship in preaching the gospel to the whole wide world. The church that is poor, that is in debt, that has no house of its own in which to meet, that is unable to secure a pastor for all his time, can not make a better investment than by making a liberal offering, according to its means, for Foreign Missions.

7. That if we are able to send out at least twelve new missionaries this year our work will really suffer for lack of re-enforcements. The present force is overworked. Some are breaking down.

8. That at least $10,000 is required to meet pressing needs for more buildings.

9. That it is easier to accomplish something creditable than to do only the ordinary. Several churches that raised $600 last year said it was done with more ease than raising one hundred or one hundred and fifty dollars in former years. A number of churches could raise $50 with more ease than they are now raising $10 to $25.

10. That no church should be satisfied until it spends as much for world-wide evangelism as it expends upon itself. Some churches in the religious bodies around us give five or six times and even eight times, as much for work outside as they spend upon themselves.

11. That a church must go to the lost with the gospel or go to death and oblivion. We have recently removed from our books about 300 churches that were reported to us as "dead." These dead churches had no part in this work while they pretended to live.

12. This cause is the work of the Church of Christ. The very essence of the church's existence is its missionary character. This work rests upon the clear, definite and positive teaching of the inspired Word of the living God. "Go" is the core of the gospel. God is the author of all going. He is the universal Sender. Jesus was the first missionary. His own origin was missionary. He trained the twelve for this special work. The infant church went everywhere preaching the word. The New Testament Church was one great missionary body. If we really restore the Apostolic Church we must reproduce the New Testament teaching and spirit of missions.

The prospects were never before brighter for an advance than they are to-day. We believe the churches will do their duty. We believe there will be a great advance. We believe new churches will come into this larger fellowship. If we raise a quarter of a million dollars this year, it will send a thrill of joy around the world. The missionaries will be cheered in their work. Our churches in the home land will take new courage. And above all it will please our Lord whom we serve and whose we are.

F. M. RAINS, Cor. Sec.

A Question of Authority.

In the Independent of Feb. 4 is an interesting article from the pen of Amory H. Bradford, D. D., on "A Proposition for Christian Union." There is much, yea very much, in this article that has the right ring. But some things are curious. He argues well for the union of the Presbyterians and the Congregationalists. But when he seeks a union of the Baptists and Congregationalists he makes some queer statements. The only vital difference between the Baptists and the Congregationalists is the question of baptism. But this need be no barrier, according to Dr. Bradford. He says, "let the whole question be settled by the individual conscience." Let each church, both Baptist and Congregational, have a baptistry. When a candidate desires immersion let him be immersed. When he desires to be sprinkled, let him be sprinkled. Let the Baptist preacher sprinkle those so desiring and the Congregational preacher immerse those who so decide. That sounds well, doesn't it? But let this question be asked in all frankness. Has the Divine Head of the church any mind on this subject? Is our God a God of confusion? Has he said nothing on the question of baptism? Is there any Scripture for the do-as-you-please basis for Christian union?

Brethren, get out your old sermon on "The Authority of Christ" and revise it if need be, expand it into seven or eight sermons and preach them from every housetop. Let the editors of our papers speak again on this subject. When the religious world has finally comprehended this great truth then will the Disciples of Christ be more fully understood and Christian union will be at hand. The lost authority of Christ is the greatest loss to the church. Let us labor to restore it.

C. A. FREER.

Simply as a matter of sagacity, all bankers, merchants, manufacturers, contractors, organizers and employers of every kind should be interested in Christianity, and all allied institutions, which enlighten the conscience, develop the will, purify the desires, and raise the moral tone of mankind. Commerce should no more neglect to safeguard the moral element, so essential to its security, than to neglect insurance or taxes, which provide against possible losses, and give protection.—The Examiner.

DOCTOR'S COFFEE

And His Daughter Matched Him.

Coffee drinking troubled the family of a physician of Grafton, W. Va., who describes the situation briefly:

"Having suffered quite a while from vertigo, palpitation of the heart and many other derangements of the nervous system and finding no relief from usual methods of treatment, I thought to see how much there was in the Postum argument against coffee.

"So I resorted to Postum, cutting off the coffee, and to my surprise and satisfaction have found entire relief from all my sufferings, proving conclusively the baneful effect of coffee and the way to be rid of it.

"I have found Postum completely takes the place of coffee both in flavor and in taste. It is becoming more popular every day with many of our people and is having great demand here.

"My daughter, Mrs. Long, had been a sufferer for a long time from attacks of acute indigestion. By the dismissal of coffee and using Postum in its place she has obtained complete relief.

"I have also heard from many others who have used your Postum very favorable accounts of its good effects.

"I prescribe Postum in place of coffee in a great many cases and I believe that upon its merits Postum will come into general use." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Judgment.

A SERMON: By J. Murray Taylor.

"For we must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ; that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done, whether it be good or bad" (2 Cor. 5:10). "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this cometh judgment" (Heb. 9:27). "And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat upon it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, the great and the small standing before the throne; and books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books, according to their works. And death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death, even the lake of fire. And if any was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:11-15).

Without stopping to give the exegesis of these several passages of Scripture, we will proceed to give some thoughts which grow out of them concerning the general judgment.

These judgments are all future. God has stamped his creation with an intelligent purpose. We will go to our own place; will reap what we sow; our sins will find us out. Things are not as they should be now, but there is coming a time by and by when there will be a new adjustment of things—when each man, like the thief on the cross, will receive the due rewards of his deeds, whether that reward be good or bad. "Sooner or later the wrong will be righted, sooner or later the wicked will fail; sooner or later the dark will be lighted, sooner or later the good will prevail." Death does not end all. It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this cometh judgment. Voltaire is doing more harm than while alive. Paul, though dead, yet speaketh. There is a hell to shun if there is a heaven to gain. Salvation implies danger—something to be saved from. If I tell you I have saved a man from drowning, you naturally think of water; if I tell you that I saved a man from being burned to death, you at once think of fire; or, if I tell you I saved a man from being shot, you instinctively think of a pistol or gun. So then it is impossible for a person to think of being saved without thinking of that from which he has been, or is to be, saved.

Right here is where the universalist doctrine breaks down. They say that all people will be saved. But the question arises: Saved from what? From danger? But there is no danger. Saved from torment? But there is no torment. Saved from hell? But there is no hell. The question arises again: Saved from what? Universalism not only contradicts the Savior's teaching, but it defeats itself. Jesus said, for instance: "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." The universalist says, "Blessed are the impure in heart: for they shall see him also." Again Jesus says, "Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have the right to come to the tree of life, and may enter in by the gates into the city." But our universalist brother would say: "Blessed are they who do not wash their robes, that they may also have the right to come to the tree of life, and may enter in by the gates into the city!" And so we might go on, but we have not time. The best and safest way is just to take the Savior at what he said, and then if there is any mistake, it will be his and not ours. Heaven is a prepared place for a prepared people. Hell is not the lashings of a guilty conscience in this life. If it were, then those who need it most and deserve it most, would get none at all.

But we started out to speak on the judgment, so let us turn now to a brief discussion of the subject and see if we can find out who will be there and something of the character of the judgment.

1. All bad people from murderous Cain will be there. Booth, Guiteau and Czolgosz will be there. Ananias and Sapphira and all of their wonderfully increased tribe will be there. Judas Iscariot, who betrayed his Lord with a kiss and sold him for thirty pieces of silver, and all the men and women who from that day to this have been trying to deceive both men and God, will be there. All thieves from the impenitent one on the cross down to the one who has committed the last theft, will be there. All gamblers will be there. Those who are selling that accursed stuff that makes "wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends and all of them paupers and beggars," will be there.

2. All good people from righteous Abel, will be there. Isaac, Jacob, Samuel, Peter, John and Paul will be there. John the Baptist, James and Stephen, Judson, Carey and Moffet, Luther, Wesley and Campbell—yea all the blood-washed and blood-bought throng from every tribe and tongue and nation and people will be there.

3. All warriors, Abraham, Joshua, David, Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon, Hamilton, Lee, will be there. Those who have wielded the glittering steel in the mighty conflicts of earth, will be asked how they used the sword of the spirit; and those who were so successful in the battles of earth, will be asked if they were successful in fighting the good fight of faith. This will be the place to tell whether or not we have fought in vain or run in vain.

4. All astronomers will be there. Galileo, Sir Isaac Newton and all those who, through their science, have been studying the sun, moon and stars for the past centuries—these will all be present to receive the judgment of him who made all the planets of the universe, and they will learn that Joseph Addison was right when he declared that all of these bright bodies were forever singing as they shine. "The hand that made us is divine."

5. All the poets will be there—Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, Burns—"must all give an account." Some of them, like the "sweet singer of Israel," have soothed the sorrows of earth's millions by their songs, while others have put up the wild cry of despair or the wail of the wilderness, so that the multitudes could not hear the voice of the Master when he said, "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

6. Loved ones will be there—yours and mine. Some are sleeping in Greenland's icy mountains buried beneath the everlasting snows, others in the Southland where the sweet magnolia blooms, but they will all be present, for, "The hour cometh in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of the judgment."

7. The fair-haired boy lost at sea, will be there. Many a mother's heart was broken when the news reached home that the Maine had been blown up; perhaps they thought they would never see their sons again, but they will, for "The sea shall deliver up the dead which are in it." "We must all appear."

8. The young and old, rich and poor, "great and small"—saloon-keepers and preachers, all, all shall be there. O my soul, what an assembly!

Let us notice the character of the judgment.

1. It is certain. "We must all appear." Men may commit crimes in this life and go unpunished here, but we cannot dodge the higher court. "Every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." The judgment is just as certain as death—yea, even more certain, "for we shall not all sleep (die)." There will doubtless be many at the judgment who have never died the physical death. The judgment is certain.

2. It will be a searching judgment. "Thou, God, seest me." "The eye of the Lord is everywhere, beholding the good and the evil." "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? Or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there. If I make my bed in [Sheol, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me. And thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall overwhelm me, and the light about me shall be night; even the darkness hideth not from thee, but the night shineth as the day. The darkness and the light are both alike to thee." This passage, too clear to need comment, shows that God is omniscient as well as omnipresent.

3. It will be an equitable judgment. "According to what we have done, whether it be good or bad." The Judge made the law and knows how to interpret it. There will be no bribing the jury. "In the corrupted currents of this world, offense's gilded hand may shove by justice, and oft 'tis seen the wicked prize itself buys out the law; but 'tis not so above. There is no shuffling, there the action lies in its true nature, and we ourselves compell'd even to the teeth and forehead of our faults to give in evidence." The rich and poor will be judged alike there, and character, not clothes, will be the test. "Through tatter'd clothes great vices [do] appear; robes and furr'd gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold, and the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks; arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw does pierce it."

4. It will be a final judgment. We may go to a higher court here, but in vain do we appeal to another court when God has passed judgment. This will be "the great and final judgment, when the hidden comes to light." He who is found to be unrighteous on the last great day when the books shall be opened and when the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest, will be permitted to do unrighteousness still, and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still. Now is the time to prepare for this judgment. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in Sheol, whither thou goest."

5. One of two sentences will be heard: Either "come ye blessed," or "depart ye cursed." You have it in your own power to say which one it will be. Hell is the logic of sin; heaven is the logic of righteousness. God's laws are inexorable; we reap what we sow. If a child puts its finger in the fire, it must suffer the consequences regardless of the parent's love. And the "natural law," to this extent at least, obtains in the "spiritual world." For the closing illustration I am indebted to Mr. Moody. There were once some hunters out in the prairies. It was autumn, and, having had no grain for several months, the grass, which was very thick on the ground, was very dry. In firing off the gun, the grass accidentally caught on fire. They ran immediately for their lives, but all to no avail, they cannot outrun the fire which is being carried at a terrible rate by the fierce winds. Presently it occurs to one to set the grass on fire at his feet, and before the oncoming flames can reach him, he steps over on the bare spot before him which has already been burned and is in perfect safety. So there is but one safe place for the sinner, and that is at the foot of the cross and at the feet of Jesus. The great fire of God's justice has already swept over this place. More than eighteen years ago the storm burst on Calvary, and the Son of God took it into his own bosom, and now, if we take our stand by the cross, we are safe for time and eternity. So if we would be free from the condemnation of the sins that are past, and from the power of the temptations that are to come, we must take our stand on the rock of ages. Then we may let death, and the grave, and the judgment come, and we need fear no evil, for the victory is ours through Christ.

We shall find that the love of nature, wherever it has existed, has been a faithful and sacred element of human feeling; that is to say, supposing all the circumstances otherwise the same with respect to two individuals, the one who loves nature most will always be found to have more capacity for faith in God than the other.—Ruskin.

News From Many Fields

Colorado.

J. H. Mohorter, pastor of the Central Church, Pueblo, held a three weeks' meeting with the Broadway Church in that city. Clyde Darsie, the pastor, says it was just the kind of a meeting he wanted,—good hearing all through, and the methods used were dignified. There were 35 additions, 20 by confession, nine by relation, and six from other religious bodies.

The church at Wray has just closed a two weeks' meeting. The pastor, G. C. Johnson, did the preaching, and R. A. Givens, of Denver, led the singing. There was a good interest, and two were added from the Baptist Church. A further harvest is expected from the sowing in the meeting.

J. E. Pickett is entering upon a meeting with the church at Windsor. S. K. White is pastor, and he is doing excellent work. A few months since he started out to raise the indebtedness, which was $1,650. By Jan. 17, he had almost $1,100. That day was chosen as dedication day. B. B. Tyler preached. The corresponding secretary [had] charge of the money raising. Almost $300 more was secured. Eight members assumed the remainder, about $250, and the house was [dedicated] by Brother Tyler. The energetic pastor had, at last report, cut the remainder down to $150. We expect to hear soon that every cent has been paid.

Thirty additions recently to the church at Fort Collins, most of them during the meeting held by F. O. Fannon. Brother Fannon's preaching was very much enjoyed, and provoked thought in his hearers. The Fort Collins Church is aggressive and hopeful. The pastor, Wm. J. Lockhart, says they purpose to make state missions paramount to every other call during the next two months. Let other churches which have not taken the offering do likewise. The work needs it badly, as the treasury is empty, and another quarter's pay will be due the mission pastors April 1.

Beginning Jan. 10, L. H. Humphreys, of Delta, Iowa, held a three weeks' meeting at Longmont, in which 32 were added, 14 by baptism. Brother Humphreys has accepted the call of the Longmont Church, and enters upon his pastoral duties March 1.

E. F. Harris, who for so many years has preached at Berthoud and Longmont, has taken temporary charge of the work in Cripple Creek, and may remain there. Samuel R. Wilson, of Fort Collins, has succeeded Brother Harris at Berthoud, but will reside in Fort Collins.

Ward Russell, pastor at Florence, recently gave his lecture, "The Lost Rib," for the benefit of his Christian Endeavor Society. The lecture was delivered in the Presbyterian Church, was heard by a large house, notwithstanding four counter attractions the same evening, and the Endeavorers cleared a handsome sum. Those who heard the lecture were delighted. The Christian Endeavorers of the South Broadway Church of Denver, have just voted to have Brother Russell give them the lecture at an early date.

L. E. Brown, pastor at Colorado Springs, is in a meeting with R. H. Lampkin at La Junta, and Robert W. Moore is holding a meeting with his own church at Lamar. Have not heard results from either field yet.

The sincere sympathy of his many friends in Colorado is extended to F. F. Walters, of Grand Junction, who recently buried his aged father, at the parental home in Coffeyville, Kan. Brother Walters had but gotten home and resumed his work until he was called to return on account of his mother. He is now in the old home, with his brothers and sisters awaiting the home-going of their mother. May grace sustain them all.

F. L. Cook, of Sedalia, Mo., began his pastorate at Salida, in January, and the church is much encouraged.

Walter Kline, who has been pastor at Canon City for a year, closed his work there Feb. 14, and has taken the work at Streator, Ill.

Vineland is a country church, ten miles east of Pueblo. W. S. Fisher is their minister. He lives upon a ranch near the church. A new building is being erected. Brother Fisher has recently done some preaching on the St. Charles River, not far from Vineland, with ten confessions at latest report.

The church at Craig has had 23 baptisms and five other additions in the last three weeks. This is truly a great gain in that work. A union meeting was held in the Congregational Church, and the evangelist promised that he would advise those who made confession to unite with one or the other of the churches in the town, (there are but the two, Congregational and Christian,) and that he would make no effort to influence their choice. While the methods used were not such as we are accustomed to, and much of the preaching contrary to the things most surely believed among us, yet, "with Bible in hand, and best of all with it in mind we worked and prayed," writes J. L. Ellis, the pastor, and the above is the result to date. And others are expected soon. Brother Ellis has again been called by the church at Craig, to give his entire time to the work, and will also look after the work in the Snake River country, to the North.

Union meetings have been in progress at Golden almost five weeks. J. W. Maddux, our pastor, has done much preaching in this series, and one result to our own congregation is five baptisms, and others to come soon. Brother Maddux and family have moved into their new home.

The work at the Central Church, Denver, is moving steadily forward under the leadership of Bayard Craig, the pastor. Twenty-one additions the last month, four conversions, seven by statement, ten by letter.

B. B. Tyler has just passed through a severe attack of the grippe, which partially incapacitated him for his usual duties, but he is again taking up regular lines. The church at South Broadway is happy, hopeful and prosperous.

L. E. Scott, pastor at Greeley, has recently done some excellent mission work at two county points in opposite directions from Greeley, baptizing four people, including a teacher and a prominent ranch foreman. Also received a gentleman, formerly a Baptist, into our fellowship. He is a prominent man, being manager of the large Studebaker-Lamb-Witwer horse ranch east of Greeley. These additions will strengthen Greeley.

Again we remind our pastors and churches of the needs of our state work. A little over $700 under pledge, and five months of the missionary year gone. If we fail in state work we fail in everything, for this is the foundation of all. The latest pledge is from Colorado City, $39.92.

Kansas.

Our next state convention has been set for July 25 to 28. The place is Paola. W. S. Lockhart and his splendid congregation are beginning now to get ready for this gathering. The last convention voted to set the date the last week in August, but the Paola church discovered that owing to a Teacher's Institute being held that month, they could not entertain the convention at that time. The matter has been quite fully discussed and carefully considered by the State Board at two meetings, and it was decided that as our missionary year ends with the month of June, and the majority of the brethren in the state seemed to favor a summer convention, it was better to place the date in July rather than in September.

It has been suggested that the date for holding our state convention be settled upon and made permanent, so that there will be no shifting about from year to year. This is a good idea, and the coming convention should consider this matter. Here is an item for the committee on future work.

The March offering for foreign missions is now on, and the Kansas churches should all observe it.

C. L. Milton goes from Ft. Scott to Lawrence, April 1. He has been at Ft. Scott ten and one-half years, the longest pastorate in the state save that of F. E. Mallory's, which exceeds it by seventeen days.

L. H. Barnum changes from Horton to Caldwell, beginning at once with a meeting.

H. I. Bryant will soon organize a new church at Sylvan Park in Morris county. This will be three new churches for Brother Bryant in two years in Morris county.

S. W. Elam's work prospers at Windom, where he preaches half time.

We dedicated at Perry last Lord's day. Raised $700 of the $1,000 needed, and left Neal Overman on the ground to finish up the work.

Brother Overman has been called to preach for the church at Oakland full time. His meeting there resulted in 105 additions.

F. M. Cummings reports all well and prospering at Sedan and Peru.

Robert Simons is pushing the Kansas Messenger with characteristic energy. The subscriptions are rolling in. The paper is getting better all the time. Send your name and 50 cents to Robt. Simons, Chetopa, Kan., and get the paper for a year. W. S. Lowe.

Nebraska.

Brother Forell reports a good Bible-school in operation at Hampton, where he recently held a meeting and re-established the church.

J. E. Wilson had nine additions at Firth. Has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Belvidere church, beginning March 6.

Brother Swander reports one more baptism at North Platte since the meeting held by Brother Ogden.

J. S. Miller has been clearing up the matter of the ownership of the building at Edison, finding that it is unequivocally the property of the Church of Christ. A. C. Corbin will be with him in the meeting on March 6.

Simpson Ely is to hold a meeting at Pawnee City in March or April. T. A. Lindenmeyer is the pastor.

O. L. Adams, of Iowa, has been called to the work at Overton and will begin March 6.

C. E. Davis, of Kansas City, is in correspondence with Red Cloud.

J. W. Hilton reports 49 additions to the Bethany congregation in his meeting now in progress. Will probably not close until March 6.

The secretary visited Red Cloud on Feb. 14. This church has been pastorless for some time and is correspondingly depressed. They have a good Bible-school and are planning to locate a preacher and go forward. It was my pleasure to make brief calls on the pastor of the Fairbury congregation, Brother Holmes. They have put in steam heat and so decorated their house as to make it a beautiful structure inside as well as outside. One will go far before finding as fine a house. It is probably a tie between Fairbury and Grand Island as to which has the better house. Since the latter has rebuilt, they have a beautiful auditorium. Brother Doward has a growing work on his hands there, and the people in this and other states that have contributed to the fund for the purchase of the building, may be well contented with the investment. The work is progressing satisfactorily also, which is the vital thing.

I was called to Ord to look after the matter of caring for some young people who had in a recent union meeting signified an intention to enter the Christian Church. A meeting of eight days resulted in receiving 13 from this source out of 22 names, and adding 10 others to the church and one probationer of the M. E. Church baptized. In all there were 20 baptisms and three received by letter. This church has some splendid people in its membership and needs a good preacher badly. County seat of Valley county, and in a fertile valley.

I will visit the Omaha City mission at 24th and Ames Ave., Feb. 28. This work is now in charge of Bro. C. A. Lyman.

A. L. Ogden is at Alma at this writing. Will likely go next to Bee for a short meeting. J. W. Walker has tendered his resignation at Wakefield to take effect soon. S. A. Kopp is holding a meeting at Magnet, assisted by Fred Barnard. O. A. Truman closes his work at Fairfield, March 1.

The Pulpit Supply Committee has been working diligently to obtain a supply of competent men to meet the demands made upon them by pastorless churches. This has proven to be a task of unusual difficulty. Our churches are asking for increased ability, and are not offering an advance of salary. In some instances this is impossible. In others, perhaps, it would not be difficult to raise a proper remuneration if the well-to-do members would make as much or half as much "sacrifice" as they want the incoming preacher to make. In some instances there seems to be a generous willingness to let the preacher make all the sacrifices.

Are you doing your part to help the foreign work receive its $250,000 this year? Every church in Nebraska should remember this work. It is God's work as well as the local work, and we may not neglect it and be blameless. March is the Month!

Iowa.

Evangelist H. L. Anthony has 41 additions in the Castana meeting, or had the 22nd inst. Eleven made the confession last Sunday.

B. E. Youtz is in a good meeting at Adaza with good interest and two confessions up to Tuesday of this week. The brethren at Adaza are having a hard pull financially. They have had three crop failures in succession.

Bro. A. L. Criley is happy and prosperous in the church work at Sheldon, but a letter from him a few days ago said that his wife was suffering an attack of appendicitis, but was improving.

O. L. Adams will close his work at New York and Bethlehem next Lord's day to take the work at Overton, Neb.

Jesse Coffin closed his meeting at Kellerton with 75 additions.

We rejoice in the great victory at Leon in the dedication of their elegant new house of worship. Brother Hubble and his congregation have accomplished a work very much to his credit and to the advancement of the cause of Christ in that section of the country. Our work in southern Iowa has made great advancement in church building during the last few years. The following churches have built new houses or remodeled old ones within the last six years: Keokuk, Ft. Madison, Burlington, South Ottumwa, Albia, Russell, Centerville, Corydon, Allerton, Bedford, Bradyville, Sidney, Northboro, Bloomfield, Oakland and Mount Ayr are getting ready to build new houses. In the above list I overlooked the churches at Sugar Creek, Selection, Moravia, Barlett, Essex and perhaps others. It will be observed that this has all been accomplished in the two tiers of counties lying along the south border of the state.

Pastor W. B. Clemmer and congregation are planning to lift the debt from the Council Bluffs church. Brother Clemmer is well pleased with his congregation, and the report shows all departments of the work to be in excellent condition.

Miss Lucille May Park, one of our best lady singing evangelists, can be secured for revival meetings. She is at Waterloo, Neb. Her terms are $10 per week and expenses.

The following are some of our pastorless churches: Goldfield, Jefferson, Primghar, Defiance, Humeston, Wapello, Mount Pleasant and Farragut want pastors for full time. Manning, Modale, Mondamin, Ute, Bristow, Marble Rock, Greeley, Olin, Preston, Nevada, Colo, Massena, Braddyville, Kellerton, want a minister for half time each. In order to save time, in effecting an engagement, all ministers writing to the above congregations will do well to keep in mind some of the following items: Married or single, some idea as to age, name the two churches for which you

There is a best time for doing everything—that is, a time when a thing can be done to the best advantage, most easily and most effectively. Now is the best time for purifying your blood. Why? last preached. A letter from your state corresponding secretary or some one who is well known will help. In other words, give the churches some idea of you and your work. What is needed above everything else is men who are good ministers and good men. The better a man knows the word and can preach it the more will his services be in demand.

Iowa is a newer field than many think for, and as a result there is a greater demand for evangelistic pastors than in some states. When it is known that 20 years ago there were only 16,133 Disciples in Iowa and 55,000 now, it will appear that the work of the Lord in Iowa has been pushed vigorously and, as a result, we have a large number of fields that need recruiting in order that the work may be kept alive.

Kentucky.

J. E. Payne, of Hodgenville, has accepted a call to Glasgow, succeeding W. M. Baker, who recently went to Meridian, Miss.

J. W. Masters closed a splendid meeting at Hall's Chapel, which resulted in 32 additions.

T. S. Tinsley, of the Clifton Church, Louisville, is in a meeting with the church at Grayson, assisting D. G. Combs.

W. S. Gamboe, of Ashland, has been in a good meeting with W. C. Prewitt at Wells-ville, Ohio. At last report there had been 11 added.

B. W. Bass, of Lexington, has accepted a call to the Parkland Church, Louisville, succeeding P. H. Duncan, who recently resigned.

G. G. Bersot, of Louisville, is giving half-time this year to the church at Glendale.

M. J. Ross, of Lexington, has accepted a call for half-time at Alton.

R. L. Porter reports five additions at regular service recently at Vanceburg. The work here is prospering under his faithful ministry.

R. H. Crossfield is in a splendid meeting with "home forces" at Owensboro. There were 16 additions at first service.

The First District C. W. B. M. and Sunday-school Convention will be held April 13, 14 at Shelbyville. This district is composed of the counties of Jefferson, Shelby, Bullitt, Spencer and Nelson.

West Kentucky College, Mayfield, is in a very prosperous condition under the able management of President G. A. Lewellen. There is now an enrollment of 293 pupils from four states.

George Darsie, of Frankfort, will leave in a few days for Magnolia Springs, Ala., for a short rest.

The meeting at Mayslick continues. R. M. Giddens is the regular minister, E. W. Elliot, of Eminence, is doing the preaching, and W. H. Allen, of Lexington, is leader of song. We look for splendid results.

President B. A. Jenkins, of Lexington, delivered one of the principal addresses before the state Y. M. C. A. Convention, which was recently held at Bowling Green.

The Third Church, Louisville, will celebrate the ninth anniversary of their, present minister, D. F. Stafford, on the first Sunday in March. Brother Stafford has done an excellent work for this congregation, and is held in the highest esteem.

E. L. Powell, of the First Church, Louisville, has returned from a successful meeting at Des Moines, Ia. GEO. W. KEMPER.

Midway, Ky.

Texas.

J. H. Fuller has resigned the pastorate at Longview to accept the pastorate of the church at Sherman, whither he has gone and is now in charge of that work. Brother Fuller is a young man of superior attainments both as a minister of the gospel and as a scholar, and we congratulate the church at Gainesville upon securing his services.

M. A. Smith, so long pastor of the church at Wills Point, has accepted the pastorate of the church at Mineola, where he preaches two Lord's days each month.

J. C. Dickson has resigned the pastorate of the church at Tyler, but whither he goes we have not been informed. He is a faithful and an efficient servant of God, and such men will not remain idle long.

We learn through a private letter that the shadows of death have been cast into the home of our beloved brother, George Munro, pastor of the church at Galveston, and one of his little boys has been taken away. We extend sympathy and condolences to him and the heart-broken mother, but they sorrow not as those that have no hope of meeting again.

The churches at Terrell, Tyler, Abilene, Longview, Milford and Italy are without pastoral aid at present, and here are open doors for young, active wide-awake ministers who want to come to Texas. Don't write and refer these churches to a good large number of preachers who know you, but procure letters of commendation from persons who are known, and a letter from the elders of the church where you hold your church membership, take the train and come and show what you are, who you are and what you can do; and if you are a success these Texas people are quick to find it out and quick to contract with you. Show a good character, prove yourself a success and the Texas churches will make you a good reputation.

Our Texas Mission Board has set Tuesday, June 7, as the day of the beginning of our state convention, which meets this year with the church at Greenville. The program committee is already at work on the program and they promise us the best we have ever had. Homer T. Wilson, the president of our state convention, will soon announce the committees that they may have their reports thoroughly matured. What effect the St. Louis Fair may have upon the attendance of our state convention remains to be seen, but prophecies have already been made that the convention at Greenville in June, 1904, will be the largest in our history and for which our corresponding secretary and the various evangelists under him are hoping and working.

DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

—Matt. 14:1-12.

Memory Verses 9-11.

GOLDEN TEXT:—Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life. Rev. 2:10.
A Group of Miracles.

The stilling of the storm on the Sea of Galilee was the first of a series of miracles which were performed in quick succession, perhaps on a single day. Having made the stormy passage across the lake, Jesus and his disciples came into the country of the Gadarenes where he healed the two demoniacs and aroused the protests of the people because he sent the devils out of men into swine. Returning then immediately to the western and more populous shore of the lake, he met Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, whose daughter he raised from the dead. While he was on the way to the house of Jairus he cured an afflicted woman, and as he returned he healed two blind men and a dumb demoniac.

Third Preaching Tour in Galilee.

Leaving Capernaum again for a time, Jesus and his disciples started on a third tour among the villages of Galilee, and he first went into "his own country," which doubtless means his own town of Nazareth. Here again he was rejected by those who had known him from childhood and for no other reason apparently than the fact that they had known him from childhood. The account of this second rejection, as given in Matt. 13:54-58, and Mark 6:1-6, is closely parallel to that of the first rejection as recorded in Luke 4:16-30. It is possible that all three accounts refer to the same event.

It was during this third tour that Jesus sent out the Twelve, two by two, for their first independent work, after he had given them power over disease and demons (Matt. 9:36, 10:42). When he had sent out the Twelve, Jesus himself continued his tour alone through the towns of Galilee (Matt. 11:1).

Herod the Tetrarch.

It was at this time that the fame of Jesus reached the ears of Herod. Herod was not religious, but he was superstitious. He had murdered John the Baptist and now he thought the spirit of John had returned to plague and punish him. Herod Antipas was the second son of Herod the Great, in whose reign Jesus was born. When the kingdom of the first Herod was divided at his death among his four sons, who were therefore called tetrarchs, Herod Antipas became the vassal king of Galilee, owing allegiance to Rome. He was too small a man to be as great a sinner as his father had been, but he sinned up to the limit of his powers. During a visit to his younger brother, Herod Phillip, he became enamored of the latter's wife, Herodias, who was a niece of both of them, and carried her off. He himself was already married to the daughter of King Aretas of Arabia.

A Prophet of Righteousness.

John the Baptist was a preacher of righteousness, not only in general but in particular. His energies were not exhausted in crying to the multitude to repent. That in itself was a much needed message and perhaps took no little courage under the circumstances then existing. But John could also on occasion narrow his denunciations from the multitude to the individual, and that is always a much more dangerous procedure. John picked the most conspicuous sinner within reach, the tetrarch Herod, and reproved him for his adulterous relation with his brother's wife. Herod's reply was to imprison the prophet. He would have put him to death if he had dared, but he was afraid of the people. Herod was a coward all his life and now he was in a dilemma between two fears—afraid to leave John at large and afraid to put him out of the way. The prison afforded only a temporary and unsatisfactory compromise.

A Woman's Revenge.

John had been in prison about a year but he was not forgotten. The people remembered him when they saw the wonderful works of Jesus (Mark 8:28). Herodias remembered him and plotted how she might punish him for the just rebuke which he had administered to her. Herodias at least was not afraid. Desire for revenge had swallowed up all fear of the tumult which might result from John's death. She devised a subtle plan. She would give a birthday supper for Herod, would warm him with wine and intoxicate his senses with an oriental dance performed by her daughter, and thus open the way for a request which Herod would not dare refuse. The plan worked well. The tetrarch, deep in wine and delighted by the dance, promised in the presence of his courtiers to give the fair dancer any boon that she might ask. She asked for the head of John the Baptist.

Herod's Sins.

Herod was exceedingly sorry but his sorrow could not save him from this dilemma in which his own sins and weakness had placed him. He had begun by taking another man's wife. He had punished the prophet of righteousness for a rebuke which he knew to be just. He had given way at every point to the cowardice of a craven soul. He had been afraid of John, afraid of the people, afraid of Herodias, and now that his drunken oath was pledged to crown his crimes with murder, he was afraid of the taunts of his boon companions if he should refuse to make good his promise. The outcome was what one would expect from such a character. He did the weak and easy thing and surrendered the life of John to the vengeance of Herodias.

The Stings of Conscience.

John was dead but still he was not forgotten, and still the influence of his work was felt. After a time there comes to Herod the rumor of the miracle-worker who is doing wonderful deeds and teaching strange doctrines. Herod thinks at once of John. He was a Sadducee and did not believe in a future life, but fear and conscious guilt did for him what faith had never been able to do, in clearing away his materialistic notions. To the rest of his terrors now is added this new one, the fear of the dead man's ghost. How could he hope to protect himself against one who could return to life after he had been beheaded?

Herod wished to conceal his sin by punishing the prophet. He succeeded only in perpetuating the record of it to all generations. A hidden sin is like a seed hidden in the ground. It grows and the plant becomes both deep-rooted in the soil and conspicuous above

March 9, 1904.

THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST.—
Matt. 28:20.

"Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Matt. 28:20. One of the greatest needs of the church to-day is the realization of this great promise of Christ. It would quicken its zeal, increase its courage, intensify its hope, correct many of its errors, both in doctrine and life, and make it believe in its ultimate triumph over all its enemies.

1. A conditional promise. It should be noticed that this, like all God's promises, is conditional. Christ's promise to be with his disciples always is made on the stipulation that they are seeking to extend his kingdom throughout the world. "Go, make disciples of all nations, . . . and I will be with you always, even unto the end of the world." He is with the man or the church that is seeking to have his will done on earth as it is done in heaven. It is vain for any church or any individual to expect the divine presence and help on any other condition.

2. An antidote for pessimism. To one who really believes that Christ is with his Church, directing its movements, inspiring its zeal and sacrifices, and supplementing its weakness and folly with his own divine wisdom and strength, the outcome of the struggle cannot be in doubt. The conversion of the world does not seem incredible. The overthrow of iniquity of every kind seems not only possible, but certain. The very fact of Christ's presence with his Church signifies his intention to lead it on to ultimate victory.

3. An inspiration for larger plans. The church or local congregation of believers that has gotten fast hold of the idea of Christ's presence in it and with it, is sure not to be contented with simply keeping itself alive and having no part in the wider activities of the Church, looking to the extension of Christ's kingdom in the world. The realization of his presence is the realization of a world-wide mission. Alas how many churches are smitten with smallness—small aims, small plans and small achievements! Christ's presence realized means enlargement of horizon, of hope and of heart.

4. A motive to unity. Nothing would so rebuke the petty little quarrels, bickerings and divisions in the local church as the realization of Christ's presence. He is the source and center of unity. To think of him, to be brought under the spell of his personal presence, and to enter into fellowship with his great plans and purposes, is to be lifted above these miserable little squabbles that often destroy the influence and efficiency of a church. It would be a powerful incentive for unity in the church universal, if it could realize the presence of Christ, to heal its divisions, rebuke its sectarianism, and lead it forward, a united army, to conquer the world.

5. A cure for worldliness. Christ's presence realized would give such a sense of reality to the spiritual world, and to the divine immanence, as would shame the church out of its worldly-mindedness, its pride, its false ambitions, its reliance on external helps, its pursuit of worldly aims and its use of worldly methods, and would make it more reverent, more spiritual, more prayerful, in a word, more like its Master. How much the Church needs this purifying influence to fit it for its great mission in the world! Not until it relies more on God, and less on the arm of flesh, can it be used of God to carry on His work.

Prayer: O Christ, our Lord and Master, come, we pray Thee, to Thy Church, in ever-increasing power, and may we who profess Thy name and claim Thy promises, seek a fuller realization of Thy presence by putting away everything that grieves Thee and hinders Thy work, and by a more earnest reliance on Thee. Inspire us with larger plans and aims, unite us with Thee and one another, purify us from all worldliness, and lead us on to victory, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

Christian Endeavor.By H. A. Denton, March 13.APPETITES THAT UNMAKE MEN.—
Dan. 5:1-5, 25-28.For the Leader.

This topic affords a good opportunity for a temperance lesson. The Scripture narrates the downfall of a king announced at a drunken banquet. It states that he had been weighed and found wanting. It also shows to what depths of sacrilege drunkenness will lead one. When the spirits of the king grew warmer as the revel advanced, he sent for the golden vessels that his father had taken from the temple at Jerusalem. Out of these sacred things he and his admirers drank their intoxicants. They rejoiced over the victories of the nation over the people of Jehovah. They drank boastfully out of the vessels of the temple of God whose people they had destroyed. All the animal in the crowd had an inning. But the long lane of his glory and animal satisfaction was at that time turning, though he did not see it. The hand of the Lord wrote over on the wall that he had been weighed and found wanting. That night he was slain and his kingdom passed into the hands of Darius. His kingdom, his glory, his wealth, his life—all went out in one night of drunken revel.

For the Members.

1. Strictly speaking, appetites do not unmake men any more than they make them. The appetite for food is natural. Without it we would neglect that upon which our physical life depends. There is no need of a war with appetite as such. But there is an overdoing of any appetite that works death in every case when it is finished. Let us beware of that. There is good ground here for a lecture on the proper control of our appetites. What appetites unmake men? Any appetite overdone will unmake a man.

2. But let us not loose our senses and boycott the appetite altogether because it can be overdone, and ruin thus come of the overdoing. Certain poisons are taken as tonics. Now when one finds out that a drug he is taking as a tonic is a poison, does he straightway feel that he must cease taking it as a medicine for fear he will drink half the contents of the bottle and thus die of poison? Certainly not, if he is at all bright. He says I have sense enough to take this in medicinal quantities. So with the appetite: we can say we have sense enough to use this good creature of God, and we will not let the control of it go.

3. But, again, let us not let this opportunity to get a temperance lesson get out of sight. How about the appetite for strong drink? Strong drink is not a food, and it is in bad repute as a medicine. Is the appetite for it to be placed upon a level with the appetite for food? Not by any means. The appetite for strong drink is an abnormal appetite. Let it come from whatever source it may, it is to be refused. "No" is the only word it cannot baffle. There is no temperate use of strong drink as a beverage any more than there is a temperate indulgence in vice. When the word temperance is used with reference to the use of strong drink as a beverage it cannot mean anything but total abstinence.

4. In a great many Endeavor meetings I have heard some one spoil the whole meeting, and weaken the doctrine of temperance with everyone present, by making a fallacious argument from the meaning of the word "temperate." And then this would be followed up with a statement that we can commit sin by being intemperate in other things than strong drink. That is true. We can commit sin in other intemperances, but the use of that fact in this case is a sort of defense of the use of strong drink. It is a sort of tit-for-tat way of making an argument that is really a help for a cause without appearing to be so. All abuse of the appetites for food is wrong, but even the use of an appetite for that which is not food is wrong. And let us put in the drugs that are used by those who have made such

Oh, for the preaching of a crusade to rescue, from the control of infidelity and indifference, the thousand sepulchres of the souls of men in which a dead Christ is buried, who was once alive in them, who can be raised up again in them. And all this is not on the east side or the west side of any city. All this against the sins of the rich as well as against the sins of the poor, against the polygamy of modern divorce, against impurity and infidelity in man or woman, in whatever station and under whatever name, against the unknown Syrophenician woman with her seven husbands, but also against Herod on his throne with Philip's wife, against the sin of gambling in the drawing rooms of the rich, in the "hells" of the baser sort in the immoral recklessness of the stock market.—Bishop Doane.

To those who have known the history of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST through all its years of trials and triumphs, the anniversary number may be but an incitement to reminiscence, but to many of those of us who are younger, it is the genealogy of an old and trusted friend and counsellor whom we never so much appreciated as we do now, that we know something of the faith and love and labor that have lived in his heart and brought him, strong and loving, to us. We young friends shall love thee more now, dear old CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST! A thousand blessings on thy honored brow!

Our Budget

—Next Lord's day is dedicated to foreign missions.

—Let us have the largest number of contributing churches, and the largest number of contributing members in these churches we have ever had in our history.

—The good work of evangelism, it will be noticed, continues, and many of our churches are being increased in membership and in faith and zeal, at the same time.

—The opening of the greatest World's Fair in history is less than two months away, and what we do in getting ready for it must be done soon. Let the friends of our World's Fair Exhibit remember this.

—One of the events of March will be the Congress of the Disciples of Christ which convenes in Chicago, March 22-24. This will be an interesting occasion, and those who can do so should arrange to attend.

—Simpson Ely is in a meeting at Virginia, Ill., with good prospects.

—Harry G. Hill is assisting C. E. Underwood in a meeting at Paragon, Ind.

—J. N. Crutcher, of Moberly, Mo., will hold a meeting at Dexter beginning April 18.

—O. L. Adams, of Russell, Iowa, has accepted a call to Overton, Neb., and will begin work there March 6.

—The present address of J. K. Reid is desired. Will any one who knows it please notify W. C. Gillihan, of Gallatin, Mo.

—The First Christian Church, Quincy, Ill., gave a reception to their new pastor, Walter Jordan, and wife, on Friday evening, Feb. 26.

—The Hillside and Olive Branch Churches of Indianapolis, Ind., recently gave receptions for their respective pastors, R. A. Smith and O. E. Tomes.

—H. L. Atkinson, who has, until recently, been pastor at Geneva, O., is now preaching for the churches at Chesterland and Munsen, O., and is studying at Oberlin College.

—I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky., has been with the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A.'s at Butler College for the past week of prayer, and has been instrumental in a great spiritual uplift to the students.

—Edward O. Sharp writes: "I expect to send more subscribers to you than ever before, for the pastor's work is easier and more satisfactory when the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is in the homes of the church."

—G. M. Anderson recently addressed the ministerial students at Butler College, on "The preparation of a pastor for a revival meeting." Brother Anderson is the aggressive pastor of the Fourth Church, Indianapolis.

—C. W. Harvey, of Harrisburg, Pa., has been called to the pastorate of Englewood Church, Indianapolis. He was publicly installed recently by A. B. Philpott, A. L. Orcutt and Ira Billman. This seems a splendid union.

—The Board of Church Extension last week received $1,000 on the annuity plan from a friend in Iowa. The Board will pay only four per cent on this money, and it will help to build two churches during the month of March.

—This cheering dispatch was received just as we were going to press:

LAGODA, IND., Feb. 29.—Closed Lebanon meeting—21 days—107 additions. Hackleman a fine yoke-fellow. Begin at Jeffersonville Sunday.—W. T. BROOKS.

—The pilgrims bound for the World's Sunday School convention in Jerusalem will start from New York, March 8, to the number of about 800. Preparations are being made both in New York and Philadelphia for giving the convention party a hearty farewell.

—The Evanston, Ill., Christian Church was dedicated Feb. 28, by L. L. Carpenter. The building was recently purchased from the Congregationalists and has been altered and redecorated. The evening was given over to the Endeavor Society besides which there were several short speeches including an address by E. S. Ames, the former pastor of the Evanston church. W. D. Ward is the present pastor.

—We have received a handsome brochure containing an account of the memorial services held in honor of Gen. F. M. Drake in the Drake University Auditorium Sunday Dec. 6, 1903. The addresses on this occasion were delivered by President Hill M. Bell, Senator C. G. Saunders and Dr. H. O. Breedon.

—Granville Snell, formerly of Unionville, Mo., has taken the pastorate in the First Christian Church of Shawnee, Okla. He reports that there are a large number of Disciples there unidentified with the church and hopes that persons who have friends moving to that place will notify him.

—Bro. H. T. Morrison, who was recently summoned from Dayton, Wash., to Springfield, Ill., on account of the death of his wife, writes that in response to an announcement in our papers nearly one hundred applications for the pastorate at Dayton have been received up to date. All the applications have been placed in the hands of L. B. Courtney, one of the elders of the church at Dayton.

—The reports of the workers employed by the American Christian Missionary Society shows that during the period beginning with the Detroit convention and ending Feb. 1, they have organized 47 new churches, have baptized 2,102 converts and have had a total of 4,746 additions to the church. This is a remarkable record. We doubt as to whether it has ever been equalled or very closely approached by the work in four months in the previous history of our missionary work.

—A "Minister's Pastoral Record and Memorandum" has recently been published by the Christian Publishing Co. It is a handsome little volume of 128 pages, of convenient size for the vest pocket, with the best limp leather binding. It was arranged by Bro. G. A. Hoffman whose wide experience in the service of the ministry qualifies him to know exactly what sort of a record book preachers need. The book will be sent by the Christian Publishing Co., postpaid, on receipt of the price, 50 cents.

—We are informed that Bro. J. Harrison Jones, of Ohio, who is now in his ninety-first year, is gradually failing. Bro. A. B. Moore, of Alliance, O., says: "He has no disease and no suffering, but a giving away of the vital forces. His mind is quite good for one so old, and he asks me about the work of the church here and talks about the gospel, indicating his love for the truth he preached so effectively in former years. While he can totter about the room, it looks as if the end may come before a great while."

—O. H. Truman, Fairfield, Neb., asks us to publish the following communication: "I hereby challenge the Prohibition party or any competent gentleman to a public joint discussion of the temperance issue. I shall affirm the following proposition: Under existing conditions, public ownership is a necessary step in solving the temperance problem. The object of this work is to unite temperance and labor forces on public ownership for the coming campaign." Brother Truman's address for the present is Abilene, Kas.

—T. N. Kincaid, pastor at Hot Springs, Ark., writes: "Following your editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Jan. 28, on the Liquor Dealers' Association Combining, it will be of interest to the friends of the Hot Springs mission work to know that Hot Springs is the home of the "Royal Arch." We have 40 saloons in the city and a strong local liquor dealers' association, which, to an extent, controls local affairs. If these bad influences are to go out from this great health resort, it is a strong argument why all the friends of apostolic Christianity and temperance should come to our support in establishing a hospital and a centrally located church here. Let the gospel influence radiate from this great center of pleasure and health-seeking, as well as evil. We will fail of duty if we do not report this work."

—Joseph Lowe is in Missouri for a year and is very busy. He is preaching three-fourths time in and near Rushville, and is planting a new organization in Helena, in Andrew county. The state board is co-operating with him in this work. He has lived in the cities much of his time and he and his worthy wife are going to spend the summer in the hills near Rushville. The Rushville congregation will hereafter observe all our missionary days. They will render the Easter concert exercises and take an offering for our benevolent association. This will be under the direction of Mrs. Joseph Lowe.

—The second annual convention of the Religious Education Association is being held this week, March 2-4, in Philadelphia. The general theme in which all the addresses and discussions will center is The Bible in Practical Life. Some of the subjects which come under this head are: The Bible in Religious Experience; Religious Education in the Home; The Bible in Education; The Bible in Social and Civic Life. In addition to the general program there will be simultaneous sessions of the several departments. The program promises an even larger and more distinguished gathering of religious educators than that which assembled last year at Chicago in the convention which organized the Association.

—The American Society of Religious Education holds its tenth annual congress of religious education in Washington, D. C., March 1-3. This organization is quite distinct from the Religious Education Association which is holding its second annual convention almost simultaneously in Philadelphia. The former, which meets in Washington, is committed to a definition of religious education as "such instruction in biblical truth as results in religious life" and to a definition of religious life as "the renewal of the heart by the Holy Ghost through the truth producing exalted character and promoting glad service to God and man." The general secretary of this organization is J. E. Gilbert, D.D., of Washington, D. C.

—In a recent issue of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST we warned our brethren of the ministry against being induced to employ their ministerial influence in behalf of shady speculative propositions for the sake of making money, and we reported, on the authority of ministers of the highest standing in Ohio and Indiana, that the latest money making craze in those states was a certain patent gate. Two correspondents have protested against this as an injustice to the manufacturers and promoters of the gate. We are not disposed to enter into any discussion of the merits of the device, and if any injustice has been done we are sorry for it. But whatever may be the merits of the gate, the principle holds good, that it is a dangerous procedure for ministers to sell their ministerial influence for the advancement of any sort of money making enterprise which depends largely upon winning the confidence of the public.

—We regret to publish the information contained in the following note, and hope that a brief rest from his customary labors will soon restore Bro. Boles to health: "My health broke down in January. I have been under the care and treatment of Dr. N. Loar, of Bloomington, Ill., for one month. He says that my general system needs building up, having been depleted by over-work. Among other troubles I have Job's affliction, and I write this at Dr. Loar's suggestion. I have several engagements that he says I must call in. I hope to be able to take part in the campaign for prohibition in the early fall and to begin to hold protracted meetings in November. At the present time I am associated with Bros. R. C. Ogburn and N. O. Tate in the Great International Power Machine Company at Bloomington, Ill., and also with Bro. Tate in the International Real Estate Company of Chicago. I greatly regret to give up the battle even temporarily, but the doctor says I must do so. I write this card in order that my prohibition and Christian workers may know why I am not in the field. Until further notice my correspondents will please address me at Bloomington, Ill., Box 242." W. H. BOLES.

—A. L. Ward who is supplying the pulpit of the Central Church, Terre Haute, while the pastor, L. H. Sellers, is abroad, writes: "The work of the Christian Church in this city is making most commendable progress. It is the purpose of those who have charge of the work to follow the plan which has been so successful in other large cities, that of organizing churches in the growing portions of the city. Very recently the Central Church granted thirty-four letters to members who wished to form a new organization which will be known as College Avenue Christian Church. Brother Legg held a most successful meeting with this new body of workers. It was my privilege to baptize those who confessed Christ in this meeting. Bro. L. E. Sellers has the work in hand and has done, in many ways, a remarkable work. On his return from the Holy Land he will doubtless continue this good work. Our missionary rally was a great success. Brothers Rains, Bentley and Wharton make a fine combination. These were ably seconded by Bros. Sellers, Day, Turney, Barbre and Francis. The addresses were all of a high order. We hope, when the time comes for our next rally, that churches in the adjoining towns will send in delegations. This can be made a most helpful feature of our rallies."

Some Features of the Congress.

1. Prominence Given to the Mission of the Disciples.

One of the most interesting subjects to the Disciples of Christ after nearly one hundred years of history back of them is their place and mission in the modern religious world. They have never been wanting in a feeling of election under the divine providence to a peculiar work in the church of God, but inquiry in the last few years as to whether they were doing all they could, were taking advantage of all the opportunities at hand to fulfil their chosen destiny in the world, has made it one of the burning questions among them today. The program committee has allotted a large place to the discussion and treatment of this highly important theme. It will be found that this question is the one uppermost in the program of the coming congress. It involves the question of their usefulness and effectiveness in the religious life of the day.

2. More Time Allowed for Discussion.

It has been the feeling in former congresses that too little time was allowed by the committee for the discussion of papers. No sooner did the delegates get launched into the discussion than time was called. Very frequently just when every body was aroused to the import and value of a subject, it was dropped. The committee has assigned but one subject to a session at the coming congress; has limited the time of the principal paper to one hour and the reviews to fifteen minutes each and has given all the rest of the half-day session to discussion. The men who come to the congress and take part in it are after the truth, all the truth and nothing but the truth. Not a man is afraid that too much truth will get out. It sometimes takes time, and much time to get at all the truth. There is no better method to sift truth from error than by earnest and brotherly discussion. The congress is an open parliament, a forum of the people. The persons on the program simply start it going and give it direction. They commence and do not complete the program.

3. The Personnel of the Program.

The program of this coming congress is in every respect up to the standard of former programs, in character, intellectual strength and representativeness. The men who are to take the leading places on the program have been chosen because they were recognized as eminently capable of dealing with the subjects in hand. Every one has a national reputation for some kind of efficiency as pastor, teacher, educator or thinker. The congress has always attracted in the body of delegates the most eminent workers among the Disciples. It affords a rare opportunity to meet personally and hear freely and often the men accounted as leaders among us. The congress spreads the intellectual feast of the year, as the general convention spreads the missionary and spiritual feast of the year. It behooves every pastor to get in touch with this vital current. ERRETT GATES, Sec.

Ministerial Exchange.

The church at Berwick, Ill., wants a preacher who will locate on the field. A good opening for a consecrated man of experience and ability who is willing to work for a new church for the salary of $700. Address J. H. Smith, Box 121, Berwick, Ill.

E. L. Frazier and J. E. Hawes have formed a team for evangelistic work. They will be ready for engagements after April 1. Will go anywhere on easy terms, and when desired will assume the finances. They will carry their own song books.

L. H. Barnum, who has been pastor at Horton, Kan., for three years, is highly recommended by the officers of that church. He is open to engagement.

Dedication at Watsonville, Cal.

The Watsonville church has suffered the loss of two buildings by fire in the last fifteen years. The corner stone of the third and last was laid Feb. 10, 1903, and on last Lord's day, Feb. 7, we dedicated one of the most beautiful and convenient church buildings among our people on the coast. Indeed, I doubt if it has an equal. The architect, W. H. Weeks, who is a member of the congregation, deserves great credit for his constant oversight in its erection, as well as for the splendid design by which it was built. No brief description can do it justice. It is a thing of beauty without and within. The entire length of the building is 122 feet, its greatest breadth 84 feet, and its greatest height 60 feet. The outside walls are of Roman pressed brick, trimmed with California Caen stone, the basement being of San Jose sandstone. The main entrance is protected by a spacious porch and is approached from either side by broad stone steps. The entrance doors are of brass-trimmed oak and open into a tiled vestibule, finished in oak and wainscoted with Numidian marble. The interior finish is of oak, curly redwood and pine. The auditorium is finished in white enamel with panels of curly redwood, and the walls are tastefully tinted and frescoed. Four ornamental pillars support the groined ceiling, and in the center of the arched roof is a beautiful ceiling light, the gift of the Christian Endeavor Society of the church. The choir loft is in the rear of the pulpit, on the left of which are the baptistry and robing rooms, and on the right the minister's study. Large folding doors separate the auditorium from the Sunday school room, on either side of which are class rooms with balcony above, which may be used for recitation purposes, and also afford additional seating capacity when the Sunday-school room is thrown into the auditorium. In the rear of the Sunday-school room are the parlor and two vestibules, with stairways leading up to balcony and down to basement. The basement contains furnace and fuel rooms, a large dining room and kitchen. The entire building is heated by furnace and lighted by electricity. It can be seen from this brief description that we have a thoroughly modern and up-to-date church, and one adequate to all the needs of this splendid congregation. The entire seating capacity is about 800, and the cost something over $35,000.

The dedication services were very appropriate and impressive. Dean Hiram Van Kirk, of Berkeley Bible Seminary, delivered a splendid dedicatory address, and R. N. Davis, of Santa Cruz, offered the dedication prayer. The ministers of the city joined with us in this service, as well as the congratulatory service at night. Our preaching brethren present, in addition to Dean Van Kirk and R. N. Davis, were W. F. Stafford, of Lodi, and Henry Shadle, of Willows, both of whom contributed much to the success and pleasure of

Our Western Letter.

Jacob A. Riis has visited Denver. His coming was a benediction. He was given a banquet at the Adams Hotel, at which two hundred prominent citizens met him. He addressed a great audience of men in "the People's Tabernacle." He addressed a mixed audience at the First Baptist Church. An admission fee was charged. Hundreds were turned away. Everybody, and his family is reading "The Making of an American," this, as you know, is really the autobiography of Mr. Riis. It is said that Mr. Roosevelt has spoken of Mr. Riis as "the most useful citizen of New York." This is high praise. Naturally we want to know how it has been possible for a Dane to come to the United States and gain the position now occupied by Mr. Riis.

The Young Men's Christian Association is responsible for the visit of this "most useful citizen." Their purpose was to generate a special interest in the Association and its work. The interest has been generated. More than $8,000 are now in sight for a building for the Young Men's Christian Association in Denver. There will be no insuperable difficulty in securing the amount of money needed—say $200,000. Denver is behind other cities of its grade in that its Young Men's Christian Association has no building of its own. Dayton, Ohio, with a population of 90,000 occupies a building costing $75,000. A $400,000 building will be erected to accommodate the growing Association. Denver has a population of not less than 160,000, and no building. The Association in Omaha has sold its building for $200,000 and will build on a more extensive scale. Omaha has a population of a little more than 100,000. Scranton, Pa., with a population of 110,000 has a new building that cost a quarter of a million dollars.

It is said that of the 35,000 young men in Denver, i. e., persons between the ages of eighteen and thirty, 25,000 seldom attend church. There were arrested last year in this city nearly 3,000 persons under thirty years of age. Saloon licences cost $25 an hour; the Young Men's Association costs the Christian people of Denver $2.08 an hour. It is affirmed by those in a position to know whereof they speak that one-twelfth of the young men population of the average metropolitan city is arrested for crime each year.

The Problem of the Young Man! There is such a problem now before the American Church. The young man is a problem as never before in the history of American Christianity. What can the church do for the young men of our country—physically, intellectually, socially, morally, spiritually? This is a pressing, practical, question. This problem has been brought to the front by changes in our social and economic life within recent years. There has been an enormous increase in our urban population, young men crowd into the cities from the farms—crowd into the cities full of moral malaria. Vice is bred and nurtured in the cities. Young men are subjected every day and every hour, to such temptations to evil as are not dreamed of in the country. Boys are not permitted now to learn trades as was the case, say, fifty years ago. A young man without a trade, without a profession, without a vocation, occupies an extremely perilous position. He is not prepared to resist temptation as he would be if he had a trade, a profession, a vocation. It is a part of the duty of the Church of Christ to wrestle with and solve the problem of the young man. The Young Men's Christian Association is the church at work attempting to fulfil this task.

On the other hand our boys and girls are receiving such a moral and spiritual training as is full of encouragement. The enrollment in the public schools in Denver last year was 30,000. The number of boys and girls in attendance upon schools in Denver under religious instruction—Protestant, Catholic, Hebrew—is 26,655, of course a per cent in the Sunday-schools does not belong to those of school age. Then again the school population, according to a census taken less than a year ago, is 44,050. This would leave 17,395 without religious instruction in schools conducted for this purpose. Is Denver better or worse, in this respect than other American cities?

Here are facts, however, full of encouragement.

There are 64,130 societies of Christian Endeavor with 3,849,800 members. These are chiefly in the United States and Canada. There are 34,838 chapters of Epworth Leagues with 2,306,580 members. There are 70,000 young people in the Luther League. The United Brethren have a denominational organization with 80,000 members called the Young People's Christian Union. There are, I think, about a million members in the Baptist Young People's Union. The brotherhood of of Andrew and Philip has 15,000 young men at work for young men.

The Brotherhood of Saint Andrew, an organization in the Protestant Episcopal church, composed of young men, with a purpose similar to that of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, has a membership of 14,000. Then there are the Daughters of the King and the international order of the King's Daughters and Sons, concerning whose membership I am not informed. The Young Women's Christian Association has a membership of nearly 70,000. There are 350,455 members of Young Men's Christian Associations. In all there are not less than 7,000,000 young people banded together for moral and spiritual improvement. This army inspires hope as I look into the future.

The importance of encouraging and assisting the young in the development of character—Christian character—cannot be exaggerated. The New Testament teaches that the formation of character is the great task in life. Right character is everything. The person who is destitute of a good moral and spiritual character is a bankrupt however extensive his acres, however numerous and valuable his holdings, however large his bank account.

The Bible ought to be a book of intense interest to young men.

Joseph was yet a young man when he became prime minister in Egypt. David was yet a boy when he delivered Israel from the dominion of the Philistines. Samuel, the king-maker was a mere lad when he was called to serve Jehovah, by serving the people. Daniel standing for the right in Babylon was but a young man. John the Baptist, the wilderness evangelist, was a young man. Saul of Tarsus was yet a young man when he became a Disciple of Christ and began to be Paul the missionary. The personal friends and followers of Jesus were young men. The founders of the Christian religion, the author and finisher of the faith, was himself a young man.

The great religious leaders in the church universal have been young men.

Martin Luther was only thirty-four years old when he defied the pope and inaugurated the reformation of the Sixteenth Century. John Calvin wrote his Institutes of the Christian religion when he was only twenty-seven years old. John Wesley was but twenty-six when he organized the club at Oxford out of which came the Wesleyan Reformation and the great and growing Methodist church. Alexander Campbell was less than twenty-one when he committed himself to the cause of Christian unity and union by a return to the Christianity of the Christ in order to the successful evangelization of the world. Charles Haddon Spurgeon became pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Church in London, when he was only nineteen years old. Dwight L. Moody presided over a Sunday-school of a thousand members in Chicago when he was only twenty years old. Sir George Williams organized the first Young Men's Christian Association when he was but twenty-three.

George Washington was the foremost soldier on the continent of America before he was twenty-seven. Alexander Hamilton made his maiden speech in behalf of the liberty of the colonies when he was nineteen years old. Thomas Jefferson was only thirty three at the beginning of the Revolutionary war. James Madison, the father of the constitution, was but twenty seven when the American colonies began their struggle for freedom and independence. William Cullen Bryant wrote "Thanatopsis" when he was nineteen. He was only twenty-six when he gave to the world his first volume of poems.

A Christian Altruistic Object Lesson.

Probably every reader of the religious press of all evangelical denominations has heard more or less of the Winona Assembly at Winona Lake, Ind., and yet not many know, or, knowing, do not realize, the far-reaching importance of what has come to be known as the "Winona Movement."

Briefly, it is designed to be an object lesson to the world of money-making altruism. Of the forty members of its directory, thirty are business men. Among these are seven bank or trust company presidents, twelve presidents of large manufacturing or mercantile enterprises, four owners or managers of newspapers, religious or secular, and others prominent in various business lines, yet not one of these men was urged to serve, while some expressed gratitude for the privilege, and all are deeply interested in the work.

From a material point of view, the success of the enterprise has been truly remarkable. Though founded only nine years ago, it already has property conservatively valued at over one million dollars above all indebtedness. It owns and operates a very profitable street car line which has not a dollar of water either in its stock or bonds. So far as the directors know, it is the only railroad line in the United States that does not operate its cars on the Sabbath. It also owns the Winona & Warsaw Electric Light and Water Co., which promises to be even more profitable than the railroad.

At Winona the assembly owns near seven hundred acres of land on the east shore of Winona Lake, on which has been expended in buildings and other improvements more than $300,000. At Indianapolis it owns the former government arsenal grounds, a most beautiful grove of 76 acres covered with the original forest trees, in the heart of the best residence district of the northeast portion of the city. The buildings alone on these grounds cost the government over $600,000. With a few inexpensive changes, they will be admirably adapted for the trade and technological schools it is proposed to establish there.

Aside from other sources of profit at Winona Lake, the sales of real estate in 1903 amounted to between $55,000 and $60,000. Under ordinary circumstances when a man sells real estate, his income from that source ceases. At Winona the opposite is true. When lots are sold there the money received is expended for the further equipment of the institution for doing good, but the unique feature at Winona is that the income from the property sold continues.

Every public utility and source of profit at Winona Lake is either owned by the assembly or it gets a liberal share of the profits, yet, and this is the all-important matter to Christian readers, who are longing for a revival which shall include the consecration of property and more especially of income to the Master's work; not a dollar of the money made at Winona goes into the pockets of any private individual. There is no real estate or any other kind of speculation back of it, and no private interests of any kind to subserve. This is designed to be, and is the world-object-lesson-feature of the enterprise. Winona makes every honest dollar it can, and spends every dollar so made in doing the most and best possible good.

The six weeks' program of lectures, concerts and entertainments of various kinds is the very best that money can buy. This year the many conventions and representative meetings held at Winona commence in May, and continue into the middle or latter part of September. It is impossible in a short article like this to give any adequate description of the work, methods and objects of the institution, hence I invite all readers who desire to know more about it to write me for a "Winona Booklet," at my business address, 64 Wabash Ave., Chicago. It will be sent promptly post-paid. Also to all pastors who desire them for distribution I will send gratis, express prepaid, a sufficient quantity of Winona Booklets to furnish one copy for each family in the congregation. In the same envelope with the booklet will also enclose one copy each of

We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. ## The Buffalo Missionary Rally.

Our eagerly anticipated missionary rally, held in the Richmond Avenue Church on Feb. 22, was, in the fullest sense, a success. How could it have been otherwise with that prince of engineers, Bro. A. McLean, with his adept hand all the time upon the throttle-lever? The keynote of the occasion was struck at the opening session in his ten minutes talk upon The Great Commission. There were three sessions, at 10 A. M., and 2:30 and 7:30 P. M. The attendance was good at the very outset, and swelled into repletion as the hours passed. The atmosphere of the convention throughout was spiritual and uplifting. The "lions" of the occasion were Bro. W. P. Bently, for thirteen years resident missionary in China, and Bro. Frank Garret, also a missionary to the same kingdom.

The following addresses were also delivered: "The Gospel a Trust," W. C. Bower, North Tonawanda; "The Gospel a Power," E. O. Tilbum, Buffalo; "Greater Things Than These," J. A. Wharton, Niagara Falls; "Our Watchword," W. L. Hull, North Tonawanda; "The Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise,"

Dr. Anson G. Chester, Buffalo; "The Magic of the Living Link Idea," Raphael H. Miller, Buffalo; "Prayer and Missions," Edward F. Randall, South Tonawanda; "The Grace of Giving," H. J. Aldrich, Buffalo. Most of these addresses were beyond the average, and some of them were superb. None of them was more ringing and rousing than that of Brother Miller.

The women of the Richmond Avenue Church, who would be sure to win the prize in a contest designed to demonstrate womanly efficiency, twice fed the entire crowd in attendance at the rally.

The solos of the day were by Mrs. Edward Baumgarten, Miss Ella Snyder and Miss Irene Pellette, of Buffalo, and Miss Lillian McDougall, of North Tonawanda.

Brother McLean was pleased to say of this gathering that it was more like a national convention than any meeting of the same character he had ever attended.

It will be good news, in this connection, that our Richmond Avenue Church, by recent vote, became a Living Link. It is delightful to be able to add that its choice of a pastor in the foreign field has fallen upon dear Frank Garret, and that the Des Moines Church, by which heretofore he has been supported is sufficiently magnanimous to make him over to us. And now for grand and earnest work for the beloved Master! ANSON G. CHESTER.

Good Work in Chicago.

A three weeks' visit to the Jackson Boulevard Church makes one rejoice in the present prosperity and hopeful outlook there. I did not know we had so good a church on the West Side. The work in Chicago has been and is as difficult as it is important. So many undertakings have resulted in failure that it is refreshing to find substantial and successful work.

The church has an excellent location. It is in the heart of a thickly populated section. The people around it seem to be largely English-speaking and of the class which gladly receives the truth. They are of the substantial middle class, there being, apparently, few very rich and not many very poor people in the neighborhood. The field for work by the church is, practically, without limit. The democratic spirit of the church makes it competent to do the work set before it. I have never known a more simple-hearted, friendly, earnest people. They are liberal, too, to the point of sacrifice. They have denied themselves indeed again and again that the work may go on. There is a considerable debt on their good and well arranged building, but they are planning even now to pay it. If they do so it will be by faith. If some of our well-to-do churches would give proportionately as these people do, the financial problems of the brotherhood would be solved.

Lloyd Darsie has been pastor of this church about a year. The people love him and trust him implicitly. That success is before him no one who knows him and this good people can doubt. There have been about 90 additions to the church in the last few months, about 50 of them quite recently. The people who are interested in our work will rejoice with these people in their success.

Cleveland, Feb. 23. JOHN E. POUNDS.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Now that we are drawing near to the Spring opening, let every school prepare for a forward movement, and there is nothing more stimulating, especially if you have not had one, than the "recruiting campaign," which has proven to be a good thing in the midst of the rigors of winter in many communities. Buttons to all schools at eighty cents per 100, enrolling cards at thirty cents, attendance and offering envelopes free.

J. D. Whaley reports the campaign in full at Mt. Vernon, and with fine results and growing interest. At Memphis there is no abatement of interest, so that Brother Boyd will more than likely make the best report ever sent out from that school, though their work has always been successful.

—R. B. Havener has just completed his work at Dixon, and now we have one of the best little houses there, with all departments of the congregation in good order, and while doing this work, our evangelist was preaching nightly to the people, and the twenty-five additions, the organization of the Bible-school, the meeting of all financial obligations go to demonstrate the wisdom of the course so long pursued in state Bible-school work, and also demonstrate the efficiency of our faithful worker. Farmington is a standing evidence that one can be devoted to business and fervent in spirit, judging by the number of active business men who are prominent in church work, as Judges Clay, Swink and Nations, and of others not a few—Judge Clay not missing a Sunday last year, and always going over the Bible-school lesson with the family just before going to school. A course worthy of all imitation and very badly needed. Farmington is one of the few schools in Southeast Missouri that always help our work and do it so cheerfully that I delight in visiting them.

No better occasion for a normal class, or a supplemental lesson, than in connection with our present lesson on the Life of Jesus. Dowling's Normal Instructor is just the thing. The parts on The Land, the Christ, and The People are especially meet, and at 15 cents a number the books are within the reach of all. Money, time and study well spent.

The last quarter will soon be upon us, and we must make a very strong effort to meet all obligations promptly, and we want to urge our schools to remit us by the first of March, if possible. We have not failed during the last three years meeting our financial obligations promptly, and would not this year, probably my last in the present relationship, and if the friends will kindly help us tide over the month of March, we will then feel reasonably secure. Many schools not having remitted at all for this year, ought this first month of the last quarter remit all.

Every member in the Bible-school, and every worker with his Bible in hand and an offering from all, ought to be some of the aims in Bible school work this year, and with such a good Teacher's Bible in the Standard American puts this within the possibilities of all.

Word will go to all our county Bible-school superintendents with an "inducement" such as will quicken one and all. Let the superintendents get all else in shape to give two months to our work in their respective counties, insuring us the most complete and perfect statistical reports we have ever had. Would like to close my work in this holy cause with just such a record.

Bro. W. A. Moore took the holiday season in doing some mission work at Athena, Oreg., and, like his work everywhere, it was a very decided success, with 126 additions. Our evangelist is now at his work in northwest Missouri, ready to serve his brethren and the Master, and the brethren can save us much time by suggestions as to the points needing work and the name and address of some correspondent.

H. F. DAVIS.
1522 Locust St., St. Louis.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

Mrs. J. L. Moore has returned from a twenty-four days' trip to Southeast Missouri. Some of our sisters may think, and rightly, that our work moves slowly. If they only knew how many places refuse to even listen to our workers, they would wonder that we move as fast as we do. So many places that Sister Moore could have gone on this trip, "would have none of her." Yet we are not discouraged, for we know full well that it is because they do not know, that churches are closed to our workers. We also feel sure that in these same churches there must be souls dissatisfied with the mere possession of a church house, seldom used, in many cases, and that they long to be up and doing in every department of church activity. We pray a blessing on Dexter College, that it may send out bright, devoted young men to arouse the churches of Southeast Missouri to majestic power.

In my last week's letter the word "convention," in the last line but one of second paragraph, should be "constitution." And the third line of next paragraph should read, "only three states," in place of "only these." These, the results of my poor chirography, do not convey the correct thought which we are anxious every member shall grasp and make her own.

was briefly, "The Restoration of The Ancient Order of Things," as pertaining to matters of Spiritual import; with the Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice. Why not urge the same plea for physical healing? Have you noticed how often the Scriptures speak of or refer to Olive oil? In fact, figure or sacred symbol it stands for food, prosperity, strength, grace, joy and healing. The orientals used and still use it as a food and medicine. It is just as valuable to-day as it ever was.

Missionary Notes.

Let every church be in line with a great offering for foreign missions; March 6.

Determine to reach at least the apportionment asked of your church. Double it if you can.

A number of new Living Link churches will be enrolled during the month of March. The foreign society hopes to report fifty new Living Link churches at the St. Louis convention next October.

Aim to secure an offering from every member of your church on March 6. Increase the number of givers, if possible, as well as the amount contributed.

Aim to break all previous records for world-wide missions on the first Sunday in March.

Keep in mind that we expect to reach $250,000 for foreign missions this good year, 1904. That means the churches, as churches, must give $100,000 during March.

All signs point to a substantial increase in the gifts from the churches for foreign missions. Let every church be diligent to take an honorable part in the forward step.

The church at Akron, O., is sure of raising $700 the first Sunday in March. J. G. Slayter, the minister, is delighted.

The church at Kenton, O., with the churches in Stark county, will support a missionary on the foreign field after this year. Their missionary is D. E. Dannenberg, a graduate of Hiram College, who goes to China September next.

Last week the foreign society received another gift of $1,000 on the annuity plan. This thousand dollars will go toward the establishment of the Bible College in India.

Steubenville, O., has determined to become a Living Link in the foreign society the first Sunday in March. H. H. Moninger is the pastor.

The First Church at Bloomington, Ill., has $600 in pledges to constitute it a Living Link church. W. R. Lloyd is the pastor. It is hoped a number of other churches in Illinois will follow this good example of Bloomington.

Send the March offering for foreign missions promptly Monday morning, March 7, if the offering is all ready, to F. M. Rains, Cor. Sec., Cincinnati, O. State whether the offering is from the church, an individual, an Endeavor Society or Sunday-school. Be careful to give the local name of the church when different from the postoffice. Send by bank draft, express order, postoffice order or registered letter. He will promptly return a proper receipt. There should be no unnecessary delay in sending the offering.

A Homely Illustration.

When you get a sliver in your finger, the sensation is anything but pleasant. Allow it to remain long enough and it will fester and give you a lot of trouble. Remove the cause and the pain will stop.

It's the same way with the whole body. When your head aches, it is nature's message sent from the stomach to the brain. Every throb is but a click in the message whose letters spell "danger—send relief." Some people, when they get a headache, rush to the drug store and swallow some powerful tablet or powder which sets the heart to thumping and the blood to racing around the body at a terrific rate. Do you? Other people take strong purgatives which rip and tear through the stomach and bowels leaving them irritated and sore. Do you? Still other people take Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine.) It is a sensible remedy to use. It removes the cause of the trouble. It helps the stomach and bowels to get rid of poisonous waste matter, by stimulating their natural muscular action. It tones up and strengthens the nerves; it enriches the blood and builds up hard, healthy tissues. Only one Small dose a day is required to permanently cure ailments of stomach, liver, bowels, heart, kidneys and blood. Try it before you buy. Write us for a free sample bottle. It will do you good! ### Ohio Letter.

Cleveland, O., has one justice of the peace that deserves a public notice. He has held office almost one year. He has notions on the divorce evils. They are rare notions. He asks every couple that comes to him for the purpose of marriage to sign a document waiving rights to divorce. Thus far the young justice has performed no ceremonies, albeit there have been 30 couples that have come to be married. They all "went away sorrowful," but to another justice of different divorce notions. If you were going to get married would you sign such an instrument? If not, why not?

The evangelistic spirit seems to be on among Ohio churches this month as much or more than last month. Wesley Hatcher is preaching in his own pulpit at Chicago Avenue, Columbus, to the edification of saints and the conversion of sinners.

W. S. Priest, of the Central, Columbus, is helping W. A. Harp and the Springfield Church in a meeting. Harp and Priest make a good team.

Elyria loaned their parson, John P. Sala, to Kipton for a February meeting.

F. B. Huffman is declaring the unsearchable riches at Willoughby. For this service Brother Fields, pastor at Willoughby, will preach for Brother Huffman at Madison Avenue, Cleveland, later.

Wm. Kraftz, of the Birch Street Church, Cleveland, has been in a meeting at Delphi, Ind. He organized the Delphi Church 23 years ago.

C. C. Rowilson, of Kenton, is doing the preaching in a meeting at Ada where J. H. Miller is doing such efficient work.

P. H. Welsheimer, the indefatigable pastor at Canton, is preaching week nights for the Massillon Church, where Geo. Darsie, Jr., is bishop.

Dunham Avenue, Cleveland, observed decision day Feb. 7, when 29 made the good confession. This gave an impulse for a meeting which is now being held.

A. M. Hurd will leave Hopedale and Unionport soon to preach for the church at Cuyahoga Falls. A meeting will be held at Unionport first, beginning Feb. 21, in which C. A. Freer will do the preaching.

I. J. Cahill has been off duty for some four weeks from an attack of the grip. He has "marked up" for duty Feb. 21, but is not entirely recovered.

E. P. Wise, of Cedar Ave., Cleveland, has been compelled to rest a few Sundays. The church recently held its annual meeting and found all bills paid and a nest egg in the treasury. Brother Wise was presented with a fine gold watch as a token of the high esteem in which he is held.

S. J. White has resigned at Bowling Green, effective April 1. It is also reported that Grant Speer has resigned at Hicksville. He has served Hicksville for several years very efficiently.

A new edifice was formally set apart to the worship of God at White House, near Toledo, Feb. 14. Secretary Bartlett preached and took the offering. The preachers are all preaching on foreign missions now against the first Sunday in March. There is music in our watch-

Now this comes up to standard pitch and we say, "A quarter of a million for foreign missions this year!" That sounds good in anticipation. Let us see what sensations it will bring in fact. C. A. ## Evangelistic

We invite ministers and others to send reports of meetings, additions and other news of the churches for publication in this department. It is especially requested that additions be reported as "by confession and baptism" or "by letter."

CALIFORNIA.—Wheatland.—We have had two additions since I took the work here the first of the year and have built and paid for a parsonage at a cost of $750. I am now holding a meeting for Bro. T. P. Reid, at Gridley. Brother Reid stands high in the estimation of all who know him and he is doing a good work. We have had only one addition up to date. Many more expected.—J. B. ASKEW.

Colusa.—On Feb. 21 we closed an 18 days' meeting with 26 additions. Evangelists Platt and Honn assisted us. They are a strong team. Brother Platt is a gospel preacher and Professor Honn is a gospel singer. Since taking charge of the work here Nov. 8, 29 have been added to the church, and we are the leading church in the city.—R. W. TENER.

CUBA.—Havana, Feb. 19.—During the past few days we have seen results of long and constant work. Have had 10 accessions, making 12 since my last report. We expect as many more the coming two weeks.—LOWELL C. MCPHERSON.

ILLINOIS.—Martinton, Feb. 15.—Just closed a meeting of two weeks at Donovan, with two confessions, one reclaimed and three others taking membership.—T. F. RICHARDSON, pastor.

Carbondale, Feb. 24.—Evangelist Shearer, of Angola, Ind., is with us in a meeting. Carbondale is being stirred; 49 added up to date and we continue indefinitely.—H. G. BENNETT.

Granite City, Feb. 15.—Seven additions at regular services the last two Lord's days, one by letter, three by statement, one restored and two by confession.—M. MCFARLAND, missionary pastor.

Carlinville, Feb. 23.—Have just closed a twenty-one days' meeting with the church at Scottville, Ill., adding 13 to the membership, eight of them by confession. The church also righted itself in some necessary and wholesome discipline. A pastor will be employed for half time and a brighter future for the cause assured. We expect to hold a meeting in Carlinville soon.—EDWARD O. SHARPE, pastor.

Roodhouse, Feb. 23.—Appointments for year: Pleasant Hill first and third Sundays, Nebo second Sunday, White Hall fourth Sunday of each month. Five additions at Pleasant Hill last Sunday at evening service, four by confession, one by letter from Methodists.—O. C. BOLMAN.

Quincy.—Five have been added to the church here during the past few weeks, four by letter and one by confession and baptism. Walter M. Jordan, minister, Dr. J. A. Dungan, of Columbia, Mo., and Daniel Dungan, of Canton, Mo., with their cornets, greatly assisted in the music of the Frost Church in Quincy, on Feb. 21.—W. M. J.

Chicago Heights, Feb. 22.—The Knights of Pythias marched to the City Hall yesterday, and the writer preached the memorial to a very large and appreciative audience. We will hold our first anniversary in Thomas Opera House to-night.—HARRY E. TUCKER, minister.

Charleston, Feb. 22.—Allen Wilson is preaching to vast audiences every night. About 800 heard him on "Scriptural Baptism" last night. Just beginning third week; 62 accessions to date.—WILL F. SHAW.

INDIANA.—Lafayette, Feb. 19.—Since Christmas there have been 25 additions to the First Christian Church of this city—19 by letter, 4 by confession and 2 from the U. B. Church. All at regular services.—C. H. TROUT, pastor.

Brazil, Feb. 24.—We expect to close our meeting here to-night; there are 82 additions to date. The church here is in splendid condition under the pastorate of Bro. E. L. Day. Brother Day has not been preaching but a few years; he has proven himself to be a great general in taking care of a church. The great need of our churches to day is skilled pastors; he is an excellent preacher as well. He and his good wife are beloved by all the people here. I expect to begin a meeting in Mt. Sterling, Ill., to-morrow night.—H. H. NORTHCUTT.

Brook, Feb. 25.—Just closed a meeting at Arrowsmith, Ill., with 91 added; begin here the 26th.—J. BENNETT, evangelist.

Marion, Feb. 22.—One put on Christ at First Church, Feb. 21. The foreign missionary rally held here by McLean, Wharton, Bentley and others on the 15th was a great success. Much missionary enthusiasm was engendered.—E. L. FRAZIER.

Madison, Feb. 24.—One-half of my time is now employed at Vevay, Ind. Vevay is an old city originally founded by emigrants from Switzerland. It is situated on the Ohio river eighty miles below Cincinnati. It is a place of considerable wealth and culture, taking special pride in having been the birthplace and former home of Edward and George Eggleston, both of whom have figured prominently in American literature. The Church of Christ in Vevay is not strong numerically, but exceptionally faithful. When my labors commenced it had been pastorless for more than a year, the pulpit being supplied for much of the time by various brethren. From the first I had good attendance and ideal attention. Within the last few weeks there have been six additions—two by commendation and four by confession. That which especially gratifies me is some evidence of good accomplished by former pastoral labors which ended eighteen years ago.—J. W. LANHAM.

Brazil, Feb. 25.—Northcutt and St. John meeting closed last night after running four weeks, with 85 additions—47 of these baptisms and 38 by letter and statement. We secured Leroy St. John, a very consecrated young man of great ability as a soloist, from Terre Haute. He was a member of the United Evangelical Church of that city, but under the sound of Evangelist Northcutt's earnest, logical, convincing preaching he confessed his Savior anew and obeyed him in baptism. The whole community is talking of his singing. He is well equipped by culture as well as native ability as a singing evangelist. If evangelists are needing a singer they should write Leroy St. John, Terre Haute, Ind. H. W. Northcutt is one of our great evangelists. It is a pleasure to work with him. His work is of the enduring kind. Not a single criticism has been heard of the man and his earnest, loving yet logical presentation of gospel truth offended no one, and won even our enemies. We have engaged him for another meeting a year hence. Our work is stronger than ever before, the above additions being from the best people of the community.—E. L. DAY.

IOWA.—Colfax, Feb. 25.—Seven additions since Feb. 13. Six immersed and one by letter.—THOMAS A. POPPLEWELL.

Keokuk, Feb. 23.—Our regular service revival continues. Another confession, a fine young woman, last Sunday forenoon. Our audiences are growing and the church is prayerfully earnest.—J. W. KILBORN.

Seymour, Feb. 22.—With home forces we held a 19 days' meeting here resulting in six additions: three by baptism, three otherwise. The meeting would have continued but the preacher was hurt by a fall on the ice.—S. B. ROSS.

Castana, Feb. 22.—We are still here in our meetings, full house and fine interest. Eleven last night. Thirty-nine to date. Have been here three weeks last night.—M. L. ANTHONY.

Don't send any money, not even a postage stamp, but send me your name and address TODAY. Prof. S. M. WATSON, Dept. 147, Battle Creek, Mich.

Krosangrea.—The work at this place is growing in interest. The congregations are increasing. There were two additions last Lord's day and one the Sunday before and three the one before that. All departments of church work are getting into good shape. At the last business meeting of the Christian Endeavor, ten new names were added to the roll. The pastor will move his family from Knoxville, Iowa, about Mar. 15.—M. L. EVERETT.

West Liberty, Feb. 22.—The work of the church under the able leadership of Bro. F. W. Collins, formerly of Prescott, Iowa, our new pastor is progressing very nicely, in all its departments. The pastor held a three weeks meeting beginning second Lord's day in January with Brother Chas. McVey, of Lincoln, Neb., as singing evangelist to assist. While visible results were not great as the weather was against us, latter part of time, we feel that great good was accomplished which will appear later on. Brother Collins is an able, scholarly Christian gentleman who by his bearing and ability as well as by his industrious, untiring work, is winning his way to the hearts of our people as is his wife, a most excellent helpmate.—W. W. MCLURE.

JAPAN.—Tokyo, Jan. 30.—Our second years' work here has been a happy and fruitful one. I baptized twenty men and three women. My two large Bible classes are still growing. Our new dwelling house and chapel, erected during the year at a cost of $2,590, are quite a help to the work. The Tokyo Christian has a circulation of over 6,000. For building and mission expenses I received during the year $2,151. My health is perfect.—W. D. CUNNINGHAM.

KANSAS.—Parsons, Feb. 24.—C. E. Pile, of this place and I are exchanging rallies. Just closed at Oswego; 14 added; church much strengthened. Brother Pile began two days in advance of our coming, with nine added; three last night.—R. H. TANKSLY.

Wichita, Feb. 22.—Two additions to the South Lawrence Avenue Church yesterday.—W. T. MCCLAIN.

Grenola, Feb. 22.—Just closed our three weeks' meeting here. Bro. Fred A. Schmitt preached 13 sermons. Sickness kept the people away, but the preaching was all that could be desired. Five confessions; four others added, one from United Brethren church. To me this was a happy meeting as I baptized Brother Schmitt when he was a boy of fifteen. He captured the hearts of our people.—C. W. YARD, Pastor.

North Lawrence, Feb. 22.—One addition to the church here yesterday—a licensed Baptist minister. I closed my work with the church yesterday. On account of the flood

ABOUT THAT COAT

You wear a coat. Why? To keep the cold out? No; to keep the warmth in. What of the body that has no warmth—the thin, poor body that lacks the healthy flesh and fat it needs?

For such we say that Scott's Emulsion provides the right kind of a coat. Why? Because Scott's Emulsion builds firm, solid flesh and supplies just enough fat to fill nature's requirements—no more. That means bodily warmth.

last May the cause was so badly crippled financially that the church is not able to raise our support.—F. H. BENTLEY.

Smith Center, Feb. 23.—Brother and Sister C. A. Hill, of Ohio, have just closed a 22 days' meeting with us with following results: baptism, 14; letter, one; statement, five; reclaimed, three; total, 23. Besides the church was enlivened and greatly strengthened. We think Brother and Sister Hill to be among the best of evangelists and as such would recommend them to others.—R. C. HARDING, Pastor.

South Haven, Feb. 27.—Three more added here Sunday, Feb. 21, at our regular morning service. One from the Congregational Church who had been immersed, and two confessed Christ and were baptized into him at prayer-meeting Thursday night.—J. M. MORRIS.

KENTUCKY.—Owensboro, Feb. 23.—Closed meeting of a week with the home church here Sunday night: 37 additions, most all by baptism. Seventh meeting we have held here with home forces in the last eight years.—R. H. CROSSFIELD.

MICHIGAN.—Battle Creek, Feb. 22.—I am at this place, a new field of the Michigan C. M. S. This is where Grace Temple Institutional Church recently came into our brotherhood. I have preached seven sermons and had 29 accessions, 22 confessions yesterday. This is a fine field. God be praised for the power of his gospel.—W. H. KINDRED.

Saginaw, Feb. 22.—Closed meeting with 51 additions last Monday night. H. S. Saxton led the singing and did it well. Three more confessions at prayer-meeting last night; 68 in three months. Many from the M. E. and Lutheran churches.—J. S. RAUM.

Gorin, Feb. 22.—One confession at our regular services at Salem last night (Sunday). Good audiences and splendid interest.—F. BOYD, pastor.

St. Joseph, Feb. 25.—I have accepted half time with Raytown, Jackson Co., Mo. I hope for a good work. They are a good people. Since last report have baptized two at King Hill, this city. My present address is, 1027 Faraon St., St. Joseph, Mo.—N. ROLLO DAVIS.

Cartersville, Feb. 27.—The church here is moving to victory, since our meeting. Three have been buried with Christ in baptism. The enrollment in Sunday-school is 140; Y. P. S. C. E. enrollment, active, honorary, associates, 140. Attendance at midweek prayer-meeting from 150 to 200. I am here again to stay from six to eight weeks, preparing to locate a minister.—D. W. CAMPBELL.

NEW YORK.—Buffalo, I accepted a call to the Forest Avenue Church, and began my labors late in December. There is a great promise of good things in this locality. The church is free from all debt, strong in faith and good works and eager to do when called upon or not. Since the first of the year there have been 15 accessions, all adults: six of these by confession, nine by letter. In spite of the very worst weather known here in years, the audiences have been steadily increasing. We may be called upon to enlarge soon. Every department of the work is in splendid condition. I began a meeting with home forces Sunday night. Prospects good. Am also preaching every Sunday afternoon at Bridgeburg, Ontario. We have a small congregation there, but a willing one. Fire left us without a church building Christmas, but as soon as the weather permits we shall build. Ground has been secured for that purpose. Bro. Edward Randall, of Swampscott, Mass., succeeded me at Tonawanda. My present address is, 200 Bird Ave., Buffalo, N. Y.—EDWARD OLIVER TILBURN.

OHIO.—Report of Alliance church, A. B. Moore, minister: Additions during year, 51; decrease by death and letter, 22; money raised for all purposes, $4,625. All current expenses paid, and an old debt of $347 liquidated, and $500 paid on the building fund.

Greenwich, Feb. 22.—Closed our meeting here Feb. 7 with two accessions and the church unified and encouraged for the year's work. Six additions yesterday at our morning service, three by letter and three from Ravenna, Feb. 26.—Our meeting with home forces began last Lord's day. Audience is increasing every night: nine additions.—M. E. CHATLEY.

Portsmouth, Feb. 22.—We have been here 22 days with 211 added. The pastor, Geo. P. Taubinan, had everything in fine shape.—HARLOW AND RIDENOUR.

Martin's Ferry, Feb. 22.—Twenty-five added up to date and meeting still continuing with increased interest. Of this number, all but three were by confession.—G. F. ASSITER.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.—Gage, Feb. 25.—Left Laverne Monday, the 8th, arrived at Olita the 10th; commenced a meeting in the new church Thursday night, Feb. 11. Bro. W. H. Van Deusen arrived from Waukomis to assist in the work. We conducted meeting together. On Feb. 17 Brother Ellis and I commenced a meeting in Gage, leaving Bro. Van Deusen with the Olita meeting. Lord's day he baptized nine, and Wednesday Baptized five, making 14 confessions in all, closing Lord's day night, the 21st, coming to Gage Monday to assist in this meeting. Bro. Ellis remained with me until Monday, 22nd, when he started for Vici, Dewey county. On the 19th we moved the congregation which Brother Ellis had built up on Little Wolf, four miles south of town, to Gage. The original number was 44. Brother Bates, of Missouri, preached five times in Gage; had three additions, making 47 in all. We have the largest crowds that have ever attended any service in the town. Brother Van Deusen is an all-round Christian worker and a good preacher. He and his wife are splendid personal workers. The brethren at Olita were organized by us in December. Have their church completed, a parsonage on lot, and have hired Brother Van Deusen for half time.—R. S. SMEDLEY.

Ingersoll, Feb. 23.—Two confessions at Ingersoll since last report: three from Methodists and two confessions at Ashley. House of worship dedicated at Ashley last Lord's day.—M. B. INGLE.

Ingersoll, Feb. 27.—Five added at Ashley since last report.—M. B. INGLE.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Wilkes Barre, Feb. 2.—This has been a Lord's day filled with good things for the First Church of Christ. Six baptisms at morning service. Two confessions not baptized, making eight confessions at the morning service, the best the mission has yet held, but the night service was sorely reduced as to numbers by a rain storm which threatens a rising river and the flood repeated. May the Lord relieve us. It is terrible for the sufferers. Excitement is again high to-night. Ice badly gorged.—E. E. C.

Washington, Feb. 22.—Meetings held in school house during past week at Laboratory resulted in eight confessions and additions to the First Church. Meetings continued.—E. A. COLE, pastor.

New Castle, Feb. 25.—Have been in Third Church here four weeks in a meeting. Bro. A. M. Chisholm has been in charge of this work. It is a mission of the Park Church. The building was dedicated just before the meeting began. There have been 32 added, 23 by baptism.—F. A. BRIGHT, evangelist.

PORTO RICO.—San Juan, Feb. 16.—Our Porto Rico missions are lengthening their cards and strengthening their stakes. Two more baptisms this past week. The mission chapel at Mayaguez has had $150 improvements put upon it the past month and is now ready to do an excellent work.—E. M. PARDEE.

WASHINGTON.—Pullman, Feb. 18.—The church at Pullman has just closed a very successful protracted meeting, beginning Jan. 10 closing Feb. 10, with 91 additions, 63 by confession and immersion, 19 by statement, nine by letter. A number of these were from the denominations. The meeting was conducted wholly by local talent, our pastor, Bro. R. C. Sargent, doing all the preaching, also the most of the special singing, as well as conducting the congregational singing. With the close of the meeting there have been 101 additions since Brother Sargent has been with us, thus adding 100 per cent to our membership within four months, as we had only 100 members on our roll Oct. 15. Pullman is regarded as a very important point for our work, the Agricultural College being located there. There is a regular attendance of over 600 students, a great many of whom have never heard our plea.—R. H. TOND.

Waitsburg, Feb. 23.—Our revival meetings closed last Sunday evening. There were 49 additions: 33 by confession, four from the Baptists and one M. E. and 11 by letter and statement. It was the best meeting the church has had for some time. The attend-

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful It Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly every body knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but, simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I got more and better charcoal in Stuart's absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

ance and interest was fine throughout the entire five weeks. The Sunday school is still growing. Our outlook is bright.—W. T. ADAMS, pastor.

Shakespeare and the Rival Poet. By Arthur Acheson (John Lane.)

A new and somewhat unique contribution to the vast body of Shakespearean literature has been made by the author of this volume. It is a study of Shakespeare's sonnets and of the play of "Troilus and Cressida," with a view to discovering and interpreting the autobiographical elements which they contain. Students of the sonnets are aware that there are three or four individuals referred to in them whose identity has been the occasion for much speculation. The "Mr. W. H.," to whom the first edition of the sonnets was dedicated by the publisher, and the patron to whom more than half of the sonnets are addressed, have been usually considered the same person, and variously identified as the Earl of Southampton and the Earl of Pembroke. Mr. Acheson gives an interesting variation by distinguishing between the patron and "W. H.," the former of whom he identifies with Southampton and the latter with Pembroke. The "Dark Lady," to whom are addressed those sonnets which are not addressed to the patron, has also given the critics some trouble. Was she an imaginary person conjured up by the poet's mind because the current fad of sonneteering required a lady as the object of a feigned affection? Or was she some real woman who won Shakespeare's heart while he was in London and his wife in Stratford? The author takes the latter view, which is more creditable to Shakespeare's sincerity than to his morals. He holds further that the sonnets were not written for publication, but as private communications—some to the patron and some to this real but unidentified "dark lady." The latter, it is held, also furnished the inspiration for "Romeo and Juliet," which was written about the same time.

The "rival poet," who is referred to in some of the sonnets and is satirized in "Troilus and Cressida," was George Chapman, the translator of Homer, according to Mr. Acheson's theory. The foregoing positions are strongly argued and that relating to the rival poet is fortified by the reprinting of copious extracts from Chapman's poems. Among the most interesting features of the work is a radical rearrangement of the sonnets in groups containing from two to twenty sonnets each.

After Prison—What? By Maud Ballington Booth (Revell, $1.25 net.)

The public has known in a general way that Mrs. Booth has been doing a remarkable work among the inmates of prisons, whom the world calls criminals but whom she calls "my boys." But this volume will shed a new, and to most of us a surprising, light both upon her work and upon the whole question of the redemption of the criminal classes. Through the work of the Volunteer Prison League, which she organized, and through her own personal efforts among men whom the world has given up as hopelessly corrupt, she has established by positive demonstration the fact that the door of hope is not closed upon every man who enters prison as a criminal. There can be no scientific criminology or penology which does not take account of the fact that the criminal is a man, and that man is a child of God and, though a prodigal, may be won back. "Once a criminal, always a criminal," is not science but barbarism. It is an accepted truth that the purpose of the penalties of the law is three fold: to protect, to punish and to reform—to protect society by putting the offender where he can do no more harm, and by making him an example which will deter others from crime; to punish the criminal as a vindication of justice; and to reform the criminal and make of him again a useful member of society. In the last and most important of these points our present system of dealing with criminals is a signal failure, and it has remained for such volunteer efforts as those of Mrs. Booth to establish the practicability of reform. The book is a transcript from real life, and anyone whose heart is not touched and stirred by it is a more hopeless case than the criminals of whom Mrs. Booth writes.

The Pedagogical Bible-School. By Samuel B. Haslett. Introduction by G. Stanley Hall. (Revell, $1.25 net.)

Mr. Haslett is a scientific student of pedagogy in its modern phases—as one might know from his association with Pres. G. Stanley Hall—and he has produced a careful and scholarly study of a subject which is much in need of being studied that way. The work is in three parts. The first treats of the history of the Bible-school movement, including the origin and workings of the International system and an account of the various more recent systems, such as the Blakeslee. Both the International and Blakeslee lessons are severely criticised as unpedagogical and unsatisfactory. The second part contains a study of the psychological growth of the individual, his interests, powers and activities, from infancy to old age, with special emphasis upon the phenomena of adolescence and their significance in relation to religious education. The third part contains some considerations in regard to a Bible-school curriculum based on the foregoing scheme of development. The book is very well worth studying. The course which it proposes is perhaps too radical a departure from the present regime to be immediately practical for general use, but it points in the right direction. The tone and tenor of the book suggest that it is based rather on theory than on experience, but for that very reason it will be all the more valuable to those Bible-school workers who have more experience than theory.

The Country Boy. By Forrest Crissey. Illustrated by Griselda Marshall McClure. (Revell, $1.50 net.)

Those who have read "Emmy Lou" can be most briefly introduced to this volume by the statement that it depicts the experiences and struggles, the temptations, disappointments, joys and bewilderments of a boy in the country, somewhat as the other little classic tells of the life of a girl in town. The boy was very much like other boys—that is, he was a good deal more complicated and sensitive than boys are usually supposed to be. From the vividness of his descriptions and the keenness of his insight, we are led to suspect that Mr. Crissey must have been a boy himself at some time, and very likely a country boy at that.

Tour of the Earth. By H. C. Shipley. Illustrated. (Christian Pub. Co. $1.50.)

The author of this instructive volume is a Kansas Christian minister. He has recently returned from a leisurely trip around the world, in the course of which he made it a special point to visit the mission stations where work is being conducted by the Disciples of Christ. The volume thus becomes a record of personal impressions of our work and workers in foreign fields. It is well illustrated by photographs, many of which represent our missionaries and mission stations.

Help for the Tempted (And That Means all of Us.) By Amos R. Wells. (United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston. 75 cts.)

This is a rich and rare little book. Mr. Wells is a younger brother to Solomon as a maker of proverbs. Every paragraph sparkles like a cut diamond. Even in writing on a theme that has betrayed so many writers into tediousness and triteness, Mr. Wells is incapable of a platitude. As a help to right thinking about ourselves and our sins, and to consequent right living, we hope this little volume will have a wide circulation.

A TEST EXPERIMENT.

Peculiar Power Possessed by a New Medicine.

Of new discoveries there is no end, but one of the most recent, most remarkable and one which will prove invaluable to thousands of people, is a discovery which it is believed will take the place of all other remedies for the cure of those common and obstinate diseases, dyspepsia and stomach troubles. This discovery is not a loudly advertised, secret patent medicine, but is a scientific combination of wholesome, perfectly harmless vegetable essences, fruit, salts, pure pepsin and bismuth.

These remedies are combined in lozenge form, pleasant to take, and will preserve their good qualities indefinitely, whereas all liquid medicines rapidly lose whatever good qualities they may have had as soon as uncorked and exposed to the air.

This preparation is called Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and it is claimed that one of these Tablets or lozenges will digest from 300 to 3,000 times its own weight of meat, eggs and other wholesome food. And this claim has been proven by actual experiments in the following manner: A hard-boiled egg cut into small pieces was placed in a bottle containing warm water heated to ninety-eight degrees (or blood heat); one of these Tablets was then placed in the bottle and the proper temperature maintained for three hours and a half, at the end of which time the egg was as completely digested as it would have been in a healthy stomach. This experiment was undertaken to demonstrate that what it would do in the bottle it would also do in the stomach, hence its unquestionable value in the cure of dyspepsia and weak digestion. Very few people are free from some form of indigestion, but scarcely two will have the same symptoms. Some will suffer most from distress after eating, bloating from gas in the stomach and bowels, others have acid dyspepsia or heartburn, others palpitation or headaches, sleeplessness, pains in chest and under shoulder-blades, extreme nervousness as in nervous dyspepsia, but they all have the same cause—failure to properly digest what is eaten. The stomach must have rest and assistance, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets give it both, by digesting the food for it and in a short time it is restored to its normal action and vigor. At the same time the Tablets are so harmless that a child can take them with benefit. This new preparation has already made many astonishing cures, as for instance, the following:

"After using only one package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets I have received such great and unexpected benefit that I wish to express my sincere gratitude. In fact, it has been six months since I took the package and I have not had one particle of distress or difficulty since. And all this in the face of the fact that the best doctors I consulted told me my case was chronic dyspepsia and absolutely incurable, as I had suffered twenty-five years. I distributed half a dozen packages among my friends here who are very anxious to try this remedy." Mrs. Sarah A. Skeel, Lynnvill, Jasper Co., Mo.

Famous Men of the Old Testament. By Morton Bryan Wharton, D.D. (E. B. Treat & Co. $1.50.)

A series of seventeen sermons on the most important Old Testament heroes from Abraham to Nehemiah.

RISPIN.

Mrs. Martha Rispin, one of the oldest members of the Richmond Avenue Church of Christ, Buffalo, N. Y., quietly passed out of life at her home in that city on Lord's day evening, Feb. 21, 1904, having reached her 90th year. For the greater portion of her life, she was "instant in season and out of season" in connection with the work of the church she so dearly loved, and her interest in whose affairs was unabated to the very end. She was a conversant to a remarkable degree with the Word of God, and her views of many of its passages were original and striking. Through the years during which, by reason of her infirmities, she was compelled to forego church attendance, her patience, cheerfulness and sweetness were the common remark of all who knew her. Her funeral was attended by her pastor, Rev. Raphael H. Miller, assisted by the writer, and her body was laid away in Forest Lawn.

The Quiet Hour

There is only one unconquerable sin, and that is the sin you are not trying to conquer.

Men sometimes ask me, with horror and disgust, whether they have committed the unpardonable sin. Always I must say, "No, my brother, so long as you fear it and are ashamed."—Amos R. Wells.

Why, it is asked, are there so many snares? That we may not fly low, but may seek the things which are above. For just as birds, so long as they cleave the upper air, are not easily caught, so thou also, as long as thou lookest at things above, wilt not easily be captured, whether by a snare or by any other device of evil.—Chrysostom.

The Christian life is a long and continual tendency of our hearts toward that eternal goodness which we desire on earth. All our happiness consists in thirsting for it. Now this thirst is prayer. Ever desire to approach your Creator and you will never cease to pray. Do not think it necessary to pronounce many words.—Fenelon.

A happy man or woman is a better thing to find than a five-pound note. He or she is a radiating focus of good will; and their entrance into a room is as though another candle had been lighted. We need not care whether they could prove the forty-seventh proposition; they do a better thing than that—they practically demonstrate the great theorem of the Livableness of Life.—R. L. Stevenson.

Never fear to bring the sublimest motive to the smallest duty, and the most infinite comfort to the smallest trouble.—Phillips Brooks.

People talk about special providences. I believe in the providences, but not in the specialty. God does not let the thread of my affairs go for six days, and on the seventh take it up for a moment. The so-called special providences are no exception to the rule. It is a fact that God's care is more evident in some instances of it, than in others, upon which men seize and call them providences. It is well that they can, but it would be gloriously better if they could believe that the whole matter is one grand providence.—George MacDonald.

Half the happiness in living Comes from willing-hearted giving. Comes from sharing all our pleasures, From dividing all our treasures. And the other half is loving All things tame and all things roving; Loving skies, too, and the mountains, Woods and waters, fields and fountains. So each good child should be sowing Love seeds while his life is growing; For all happiness in living Comes from loving and from giving.

—Youth's Companion.

Fame is a vapor, popularity an incident, riches take wings, those who cheer to-day will curse to-morrow; only one thing endures—character.—Horace Greeley.

Prayer.

Grant us, O God, the courage to rejoice in Thy love even when the waters go over us. Grant us stout hearts, to meet life's hardships. Give us grace to take our joys without selfishness or ingratitude, and our sorrows without murmuring. May we not be weakened by our blessings or hardened by our misfortunes. But may we, through receiving joyfully and using wisely all Thy good gifts and bearing manfully our own and our brothers' burdens, enter into Thy everlasting peace. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Family Circle

Worth While.

It is easy enough to be pleasant,
When life flows along like a song;
But the man worth while is the one who will smile
When everything goes dead wrong;
For the test of the heart is trouble,
And it always comes with the years,
And the smile that is worth the praise of earth
Is the smile that comes through tears.

It is easy enough to be prudent,
When nothing tempts you to stray;
When without or within no voice of sin
Is luring your soul away;
But it's only a negative virtue
Until it is tried by fire,
And the life that is worth the honor of earth
Is the one that resists desire.

By the cynic, the sad, the fallen,
Who had no strength for the strife,
The world's highway is cumbered to-day;
They make up the item of life.
But the virtue that conquers passion,
And the sorrow that hides in a smile—
It is these that are worth the homage of earth,
For we find them but once in a while.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Well Served.

By Sally Campbell.

Grandmother and Janet Holt were alone together in the sitting room.

"I hate the days when you and father and mother go away and leave me to take care of things," said Janet. "Everything always goes wrong. I wish to-morrow was over!"

"It soon will be," said grandmother, but she did not try to contradict the statement that things went wrong when Janet was left in charge, as Janet half expected that she would.

"I do my best," said Janet, with a touch of injured pride in her voice. "I'm the oldest and I have the responsibility. I can't let the children pull the house down or kill themselves. I've got to keep them alive until you get back, and it takes all my wits to accomplish it. If feelings and tempers get hurt in the process, I can't help it. And they do, always; mother is sure to find all those that aren't fighting, weeping."

Janet laughed, but did not do it with her whole heart.

"Do you remember," asked grandmother suddenly, "what you told me about that nice cold lunch that you gave us, the other day?"

"No," said Janet, slowly, trying to think. "I've forgotten. Did I say anything in particular?"

"You said that it was not so much of a lunch, really, for every one of the dishes was very simple; and then you said, 'It all depends upon how things are served.'"

"Did I?" asked Janet, rather blankly. She wondered what grandmother meant.

"I thought, at the time, how true it was of so many things beside lunches."

Janet began to understand.

"As you say," grandmother went on, "you are the oldest and must take the care of things. You feel responsible. But you are not much the oldest, you know, and it is hard for the others to feel obliged to obey you. I hardly think, if I were you, that I would make it a matter of authority, unless I were driven to it. Serve your decisions with a nice little garnish of tact and good fellowship, and see whether things will not go better."

"Well, I suppose I might try it," said Janet, with the resigned air of one who considered herself unfairly censured. Then she changed the subject.

But Janet was sensible, and, more than that, she wished to do right. So, though she was inclined to resent grandmother's gently spoken appeal, the more she thought about it, the more she saw the situation as it was.

"Maybe I do order too much," she confessed at last. "Maybe I shouldn't like it any better than they do, if I were the children. Anyway, I promised grandmother to try peace measures, and I will."

Next morning, while Janet was dressing, she was busily planning "the day's campaign," as she called it. "If we can get through without, at least, one general bloody engagement and lots of guerrilla warfare between whites, why, then a full account ought to be typewritten and laid up in the family archives."

She laughed, and afterwards grew grave.

"Is everything written, I wonder, always, and laid up in the books that are to be opened?"

She did not answer the question. She slipped down on her knees by her bed and prayed her morning prayers, with a petition in them for "help to make that day better than the other days had been."

For about an hour after the heads of the house had gone, things went smoothly. Then Fritz came running in, exclaiming, "There's been a big freight wreck; nobody killed, but lots of stuff scattered everywhere and trains smashed up. It's down the road a mile beyond Scot's Crossing. I'm going on my wheel to see it."

Janet was on the point of saying, "You are not going to do anything of the sort. You know father told you you oughtn't to have gone to the last one by yourself." But she remembered in time and said instead: "Do you think father would like you to go alone? Can't you get some of the men to take you with them?"

Fritz had been bristling with arguments when he came in. He was "going, I don't care what she says," but then he had not counted on her saying anything like this. It took him quite off his guard and made him hesitate.

"Look," said Janet, who was now staring down the road with her hand over her eyes to keep the sun out of them. "Isn't that Mr. Harper's team? Run, stop him, and see whether he isn't going to the wreck. Maybe he has an empty seat."

Fritz scudded toward the gate without another word. Janet saw the reins pulled in and the big horses come to a standstill. A moment later Fritz was clambering over the wheel, and off they went in a cloud of dust, with a parting wave of a cap in Janet's direction.

The older sister turned back to the house, with a breath of relief.

"Fritz is off my mind now for hours, if not for the whole day. It was so easy and simple—and sensible, too. But what's the matter indoors?"

Very loud and very angry voices were heard from the bay window in the dining room. Polly and Prue, the twins were rapidly approaching a state of collision. Formerly on such occasions Janet had offered arbitration, but the twins were too modern themselves to have much patience with that method of modern times.

"To-day I'll offer gingerbread," she said to herself, as she hastened to the scene of conflict. Then, standing in the doorway, she proclaimed aloud: "There are two nice, hot, spicy, puffy ginger cakes just out of the oven. Polly may have one and Prue may have the other just as soon as they make up. I pass the cakes only to non-combatants."

The twins did not understand the last word, but they understood clearly what went before. They looked at each other in doubt, at first; then a tiny twinkle showed in Prue's eyes and a funny little dimple came in Polly's cheek.

They got the gingerbread and began to lay plans for a monster banquet, to which all the dolls on both sides of the bay window were cordially invited.

When Frank and Joe came in at dinner time and found Fritz absent at the wreck they were inconsolable. Janet was very sympathetic.

"But Fritz is the oldest," she said, "and you know father didn't like it when he went to the last wreck. Perhaps it will not all be gone to-morrow, and you can see it then."

They recognized that she was right, and they must not go, but they were very sulky and cross over it, and relieved their feelings at last by beginning to tease the little girls.

"I believe everything's going to be spoiled, alter all," said Janet to herself. "What shall I do with them? My own temper is weakening; I am but waiting for the last straw. The day must be saved or end in storm."

"Boys," she said, suddenly, "I know you want to see the wreck dreadfully, and I wish you could. I'd like to go myself, but we can't. So let's bandage up our woes together and play croquet and try to forget that life is a desert."

This was a generous offer from Janet; she "hated croquet." Her small brothers knew it and realized that her sympathy was real. Half ashamed of themselves, they left off tormenting the twins, and, after playing their favorite game for an hour, very gallantly gave Janet an honorable discharge. When evening came, bringing with it the absent members of the household, Mrs. Holt's first question, put rather anxiously, was, "Well, daughter, how has everything gone?"

"Beautifully, mother dear," answered Janet, blithely. "The gates of the Temple of Janus have been closed all day. They did get on a crack once or twice, but it didn't last."

Mrs. Holt laughed and patted her cheek, with a look of relief which gave Janet a feeling half of pleasure, half of pain.

"Poor mother, she was afraid to come home," she thought. "I am soglad that I took grandmother's advice."

"Grandmother," she said, in the course of the evening, "making moral garnishes and oil dressing is a very time-consuming occupation. I left undone a lot of things that I meant to do to-day and worked hard, and all I have to show for it is simply that we didn't scratch and fight, 'as is our nature to.'"

"That is a good deal, I should say," responded grandmother.

"Yes'm, but it left out every stitch on my new shirt waist, and most of the reading which I contemplated. 'A heart at leisure from itself to soothe and sympathize' is like the rest of the leisure classes,—it takes an immense amount of keeping up."

"So it does, child," said grandmother, solemnly. "It takes better keeping than you or I can give it."

Janet was silent a moment. Then she laid her fresh young face against the wrinkled old one. "It makes the dear people who have it," she said, "very lovely and pleasant in their life, as I have reason to know—which is better than any other 'recommendation,' I guess, in all this wide world."

A Word to Boys.

You are made to be kind, boys, generous and magnanimous.

If there is a boy in school who has a clubfoot, don't let him know you ever saw it.

If there is a poor boy with ragged clothes, don't talk rags in his hearing.

If there is a lame boy, assign him some part in the game that doesn't require running.

If there is a dull one, help him to learn his lesson.

If there is a bright one, be not envious of him; for if one boy is proud of his talents and another is envious of them, there are two great wrongs, and no more talent than before.

If a larger or stronger boy has injured you and is sorry for it, forgive him. All the school will show by their countenance how much better it is than to have a great fuss.—Horace Mann.

Control Your Thoughts.

Until you have learned to control your thoughts you will never be able to live a godly and righteous life. As a man thinketh in his heart, so he is; and it is because the thoughts that we entertain in the hostelry of the soul are such worthless and vain ones that our words and acts often bring so heavy a disgrace on the name we love.

Well might the wise man say: "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." When the heart is right the ear and the eye and the mouth and the foot will necessarily obey its promptings; but when the heart is wrong, filled with tides of ink, like the cuttlefish, it will develop itself in the impurity to which it gives vent.

If you habitually permit evil things to have their right of way through you or lodging with you, remember that in God's sight you are here equally guilty with those that indulge in evil acts, because you are withheld not by your fear of him but by your desire to maintain your position among men.—F. B. Meyer.

Humor and Philosophy.

I've passed the time of life when a man begins a habit merely for the sake of it being a habit.

He's the sort that looks as if God Almighty had put the finishin' touches and forgot to make the man.

Trouble may be born of a woman, but it generally manages to take the shape of a man.

The only way to be sartin you're followin' yo' duty in the world is to find out the things you hate worst to do an' then do it with all yo' might.

Virtue's a slippery thing, an' if you don't get a good grip on it an' watch it with a mighty stern eye, it's precious apt to wiggle through yo' fingers.

Money is a mighty good thing, but you can't put it in the blood, like you can meanness.

A man's table manners are a part of his morality.

Since the Garden of Eden, men have taken a good deal mo' pleasure in layin' blame on thar wives than in layin' blame on the devil.

A plain truth is better than a pretty lie.—From "The Deliverance," by Ellen Glasgow.

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER V.

Spot did not come home to dinner, and this made Mr. Stoner cross. "I'm afraid," he said to his father-in-law, "that Spot will never amount to much. There's no business in him. But he draws trade, he has such a way of attracting people! It's curious. Put him in any crowd, and in half an hour he's captain of 'em all. He's just like a cat; it doesn't matter where you drop him, he lights on his feet. But no application, no routine, no business." Mr. Stoner had devoted Sunday morning to his newspapers. In the afternoon he took a nap. George ascended to his room, and got out his school-books. Perhaps it was the slights of the morning—perhaps it was the dinner—but he was glad when a light knock presently called him from his work.

At the door stood Flora, flower-like in her pretty dress, sunshine in her blue eyes. "How would you like to spend the afternoon with me?" inquired Flora, with a low bow, placing her little jeweled hand upon her heart, then looking up with a smile.

"Oh, thank you!" cried George, gratefully, wholly captivated by her gracious manner.

"Then get your hat, for it's too pretty to stay in the house."

As he went downstairs by her side, he could not help saying, "I'm glad you know me now!"

"What do you mean?" Flora asked, stopping suddenly and looking at him with grave eyes.

Her changed manner confused him, but he replied, "You know this morning you passed right by me and didn't see me. You were with Linnie Greer."

"Do you remember our agreement?" asked Flora, with the straight look into his eyes which was so different from the glance of the other girls. "When we are alone, we are friends, and when others are by, we are—we are—we are nothing. Don't you remember?"

"Yes," said George, shortly.

"Then are you sorry?" demanded Flora, still looking at him fixedly. "Do you want it different? Would you rather go back to your room?"

George turned his eyes away and stood still a moment in silence. Then he said impulsively, "Oh, Flora, I don't believe you know what a friend is! How can friends be ashamed of acknowledging their friendship? I wouldn't hesitate to call you my friend before anybody."

"I suppose not," said Flora. "That's a very different thing! Oh, come on out doors, and let's enjoy the light and breeze and be happy! You'll have to take me when you can get me, and just as you find me—or leave me alone."

She had all the attractiveness that made her brother so magnetic, and added to this, was her greater beauty and greater charm. Her directness of manner, her absence of pretense, even where pretense would have concealed her faults, made her winning. They traversed the front porch, and stood in the well-kept lawn that stretched some distance between house and road.

"Do you play games on Sunday?" asked Flora.

George shook his head rather sadly. To please Flora, he almost wished Sunday was a different kind of a day.

"I supposed not," said Flora. "I'm glad of it; it wouldn't seem to go well with the kind of person you are. Now me, I play just the same on Sunday as on any other day; but I am not that kind of person. Neither is Spot."

"There is one thing about Spot," said George; "he is just as kind and friendly to me before the biggest people in town, as he is when nobody but old Poll is listening."

Flora laughed out musically, and the sound was so full of merriment, that he could not keep from giving a reluctant, fleeting smile. "You are always going back to that, and complaining," she said. "It's different with Spot. Don't you know it's the women who draw the lines in society?—and then the men have to keep on one side or the other. And it's we girls who say who's in the set and who isn't. We lay down the rules and the boys mind 'em. But I won't talk about that any more. We want to have a good time this afternoon, for ma's coming home to-morrow, and I can tell you, things'll be different after that! This is what we are going to do. You lived here until two years ago, and you must know this place just like a book."

"Oh, yes!" cried George, "every inch of it!"

"Well, then," responded Flora, "you must know some little incident that happened at different places—something that would be interesting to hear. Won't you tell me a little history of each spot where I stop? I'll lead the way, and when I stand still, you'll tell me something that happened there. Then always, afterwards, I'll think of your story when I am at the place. You know when a person buys a house he can't buy the associations and memories and history of it. But you'll tell me, and nobody will know but me. Then the place will always mean more to me than to anybody else—except you."

"I'm afraid," said George, "that I'd enjoy that more than you, for you've never known my family, and besides, our lives were passed here so quietly there isn't any story to tell."

"We'll see," said Flora. "Just follow me, and when I stop, think up something true about the spot, and it doesn't matter whether a thing is interesting or not if it is true." George followed her doubtfully to the side yard, where there was an absence of trees. A smooth sward, recently trimmed by a lawnmower, extended from the side porch to the garden-fence. "Now this," said Flora, waving her hand. "Let's hear about this sideyard. What do you think of when you are here?"

"Fun," said George, with a glow upon his face. "This was our playground; we used to play ball here—'catch,' you know—and marbles, too. We shot at pegs in the ground, instead of rolling into three holes like they do in a regular game of roley-poley. We took spans from the bottom of the peg."

"Who played with you?"

"Mother. You see, father has never been very well since I can remember. He used to sit yonder on the porch-steps so he could watch us. Only—he didn't watch very closely, for he was always half buried in papers and books. It was summer evenings after his office was closed. And he was just going into his big mail."

"But did your mother play ball and marbles?" inquired Flora, in astonishment.

"Oh, yes! You should have seen her run, and heard her laugh! I had the advantage in marbles, because her hands were so little she couldn't make much of a span. She used to get to laughing about it, and both of us would keep on—we couldn't stop. Then at last father would look up—from writing an article for the Burr City Chronicle. That meant we were disturbing him, so we would have to quit laughing."

"What a funny kind of a mother!" exclaimed Flora.

"A mighty nice kind!" cried George. "I should think so!" exclaimed the other, with appreciation. Then she added, "She has been dead two years, hasn't she?"

"Nearly," said George, gravely. "See, here are where our pegs stood—the grass is pretty thin in this line. And then, I think of parties out here, for we used to set round tables in this open space, with icecream, you know, and cake. And then, the games!"

"And did your mother play in the games?"

"Oh, yes! She was the gayest in the crowd. Her cheeks used to be just as red! She was small—not much bigger than some of the girls—and light and quick."

"Was Linnie Greer ever here to a party?"

"I always invited Linnie," George replied. "She was my particular friend. I told her everything."

"It's just a shame!" declared Flora, "her not inviting you to her party next week. But people have to keep up some kind of a show of being better than other people, or nobody will think they are. And you didn't drive a delivery-wagon in those days, and now you do."

"Do you think I'm any the worse for that?"

"Not worse; but unfortunate. Now, I'm not going to fall back on that old question again!" said Flora, with a sudden smile—her face had looked troubled a moment before. "Come on!" She led the way to the garden-gate, and they stood looking over it. "Tell about the garden," she demanded.

"It was fun in the spring," said George, "after the man had plowed, to plant; that was a good time. And when our grapes got ripe—your grapes now—that was another good time. And burning off the garden—don't you like to smell bonfires?"

"No, indeed!" was the expressive rejoinder.

"I love the odor," George declared, with enthusiasm. "Whenever I smell garden-fires, I seem to see us back in our old place, watching the crackling long white weedstems—and raking up, all the time, and father at the window."

"Reading?" inquired Flora.

"Yes, or writing. But he knew we were out here, mother and I, so he could study and keep company, too,—in a manner. And once in a while mother would call to him to look at something particular."

"And would he look?"

"Of course, he would look; but it would generally be too late, because he would be afraid of losing his place, and he'd stop to fix it with his finger or his pencil. That made mother sad, sometimes. And we had our cave. See that clump of blackberry bushes? It was right in the midst of it, where nobody could see us digging."

"Your mother dug, too?"

"Why, of course, she always did what I did," said George.

"How strange!" said Flora, shaking her head. "She don't sound to me like much of a mother."

George flushed and looked up, uncertain of her meaning. "I expect I oughtn't to tell you all this—it can't interest you, and you don't seem to understand."

"Oh, you can't think how it interests me!" cried Flora. "Only, it seems like playing at mother and son, instead of being real people. It looks like you and your mother must have been glad to be together, and that instead of her spoiling all the fun, she was helping it along!"

"Why, Flora!" cried George in surprise, "how could she spoil the fun?"

"How could she?" the other echoed.

"Why! she could have told you not to dig in her garden, it would spoil your clothes; or not to play marbles in her yard, it would wear out the grass; or not to play ball, it would break the windows; or not to laugh, it hurt her head; or not to play too hard, it would wear you out."

"Well!" said George, laughing, "that would be a fine kind of a mother to have, wouldn't it?"

"It's the fine kind of a one I have," said Flora, expressively.

"After we had dug on our cave till we were tired," said George—"the clay was mighty tough work—we'd build a fire out there in our earth-oven—my invention—and roast potatoes and eat 'em with salt, sitting upon our elevated railroad—we built that out of the earth we had hauled out of our cave. Then we would come to the house by the back way in our cave-clothes, all dirty, and so tired out we could hardly laugh about it—you know, it was a joke to feel how tired we were—just like day-laborers!"

"With her cheeks all rosy?" asked Flora, sympathetically.

"Yes—and as pretty as she could be. Would you like to see her picture?" asked George, eagerly.

"Ever so much," said Flora, looking wistfully at the clump of blackberry bushes. "It must have been nice. And yet—I wouldn't want to dig in dirt. And I don't care for potatoes. And there wasn't much use in all that work, after all—and people couldn't be clean, could they?"

"Not a bit!" said George.

"You and I are such different people!" said Flora. "I like to hear all about what you used to do, but I never think of wanting to do it, myself. Come on!"

She led the way to the front yard, and halted before a tall pine tree, whose lower circle of branches was near the ground. "Tell about this tree," she said. "It looks so snug and house-y under there, I know there must be a story."

Publishers' Notes.

"How can you sell such books at such prices," writes a friend who has lately made an order for our cheaper books. Think of "The S. S. Helper," by J. H. Hardin, for 10 cents, and "Christian Baptism," by Campbell, at 50 cents! It is like finding money to order from our "special list" of bargain books.

"Helps to Faith," the new book by J. H. Garrison, is divided into two parts. Part One is "Some Facts on Which Faith Rests," and Part Two, "Some Obstacles to Faith." There are eighteen chapters in Part One and twelve chapters in Part Two. The book contains 245 pages, bound in cloth binding. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

"Singing birds and blooming flowers," make young people think of "orange blossoms" and the attendant ceremonies; and then come the demands for marriage certificates, of which we have a fine line, at such prices as enable our minister friends to present these pleasant testimonials to all whom they may unite in the holy bonds. Write us.

In connection with our present studies in the Life of Christ, many of our ministers and superintendents are conducting normal classes on either the Life of Christ, the Land of Palestine, or the People of Christ's Time, and all of these are fully and pointedly given in W. W. Dowling's Normal Instructor, in seven parts, at 15 cents each, or $1.50 per dozen, postpaid.

The Choral Festival is a handsome book in board binding that has had an enormous run, but many of our friends have not seen it. Should you want recitations, prose or poetry, dialogues or other character of good matter for church, school and Endeavor entertainments, this book will fully meet your wants. Desirous of having our friends use this fine volume, we have cut the price in half, and will send out what we have at $.25.

Mrs. A. Jennie Ridgeway and her husband, before going on their trip to the World's Convention at Jerusalem, very wisely ordered the entire set of Dowling's Normal Instructor, so as to post up on the Land especially before going; and all the other delegates would do likewise if they were as fore-sighted as these two friends. Heed this advice and send in your orders at once, as we may be crowded toward starting time. Price, 15 cents for each part.

TWO POEMS

By Edward Rowland Sill

SUNDAY

Not a dread cavern, hoar with damp and mould,
Where I must creep, and in the dark and cold,
Offer some awful incense at a shrine
That hath no more divine
Than that 'tis far from life, and stern, and old;

But a bright hill-top in the breezy air,
Full of the morning freshness, high and clear,
Where I may climb and drink the pure new day,
And see where winds away
The path that God would send me, shining fair.

THE PHILOSOPHER

His wheel of logic whirled and spun all day;
All day he held his system, grinding it
Finer and finer, till 'twas fined away.

But the chance sparks of sense and mother-wit,
Fleeing out as that wheel-logic spun and whirled,
Kindled the nations, and lit up the world.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events

Russia is reported as much encouraged by Japan's failure to follow up her naval victories by prompt advance by land. But even the meager reports which come from Korea indicate that any satisfaction which Russia may feel in Japan's delay is premature and ill grounded. While one must discredit the unconfirmed reports of important battles on shore, it is clear that Japan is advancing her troops in Korea along two main lines. The diagonal line from sea to sea which forms the boundary between the Korean peninsula and the territory occupied by Russia, has near its north-east [end Vladivostok and Possiet Bay, and near its southwest extremity Wiju and Ping Yang. The Japanese policy apparently is to put a strong force at each end of this line before attempting to advance into Russia's territory. There has been no reported activity in the vicinity of Port Arthur for several days, but a detachment of Admiral Togo's fleet has bombarded Vladivostok, and the small Russian fleet which has been alternately sallying forth from this port to harass Japanese merchantmen and returning to it to escape the Japanese war ships, is either bottled up in the harbor or else cut off from its base. The most significant activity of the past week has been the rapid increase of the Japanese forces at Ping Yang. The popular impression prevails that this place, which was the scene of the first battle in the Japanese-Chinese war in 1894, will witness the first serious land engagement of the present war.

There is no doubt but that the sympathy of the American people is with Japan in her fight against Russia. Our government will preserve strict neutrality, and the attitude of our State Department has been so irreproachable that the Russian Foreign Office has felt called upon to take back her petulant and premature protest, and to express its entire confidence in our neutrality. But that has no bearing upon the merits of the contention or upon the question of our private sympathies. If Russia wins, the very existence of Japan will be gravely imperiled, and the difficulty of preventing the partition of China will be vastly increased. If Japan wins, her victory will put a check upon the Russian aggression which is a standing menace to the world's peace, and will guarantee an opportunity for the legitimate political and commercial development of one of the most promising among the younger nations.

It is unfortunate that in a case of this sort, sympathies are so little controlled by rational considerations. For example, a recent meeting of the Irish Nationalists in St. Louis passed a resolution of sympathy for Russia and of denunciation for the "pagan hordes" of Japan; also of special thanks to Russia "for her work done in the interest of humanity by her opposition to the designs of England in Persia, Turkestan, Thibet and other Asiatic countries, thereby preventing the extension of her tyranny over helpless people." Incidentally also, they expressed their disapproval of the proposed arbitration treaty between the United States and England. It would seem that the limit of preposterousness had been about reached in such declarations as these. Hatred of England for her alleged maladministration in Ireland is made the criterion by which to judge between Russia and Japan, and by which to settle every international question with which the name of England can be either directly or remotely connected. Here is the argument: England is a villain, as proved by her treatment of Ireland. Japan is England's ally; therefore Japan is also a villain. Russia is Japan's enemy, therefore Russia is a hero. How convincing and conclusive it would all be if the world and its morals were as simple as the moral order in the old-fashioned novel, in which no one but the villain ever did anything wrong and no one but the hero ever did anything right. But the world, and especially the world of international politics, is not so simple as that. No nation can be set down as an all-around villain because it has at some time done something wrong. We are not disposed to dispute what our Irish friends would say about the unjust treatment which Ireland has received from England—though the recent Irish land bill ought to be considered in that connection—but the folly of their argument is apparent when it leads to the apotheosis of Russia as a friend of the down-trodden and oppressed.

It is not the truth of the pretended revelations of Mormonism that is on trial now in the investigation of Reed Smoot's qualifications for a seat in the Senate, nor the right of the Mormons to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. What is on trial is Mormonism as a political system and Mormonism as a teacher, instigator and encourager of law-breaking. The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections is now considering Mr. Smoot's case. His alleged unfitness is based upon two assertions: first, that, as one of the "twelve apostles" of the Mormon church, he is under the orders of the hierarchy and must cast his vote in the Senate according to the dictation of the hierarchy; second, that the Mormon church still teaches and encourages the practice of polygamy and that Mr. Smoot, as a member of the hierarchy, is a party to this breach of faith with the United States government and this infraction of the laws of his own state. The investigation gives to those who believe that Mormonism is a political menace as well as a social cancer and a false religion, just the opportunity they have long sought for giving wide publicity to the facts. The Senate committee has almost unlimited power to summon witnesses and compel their attendance. The only important witness so far examined is Joseph F. Smith, president of the Mormon church.

Regarding the first of the two points raised, President Smith asserted as strongly as possible the freedom of the individual members of the church to control their own acts, but when asked whether Mr. Smoot had to get consent to run for senator, he replied: "He had to get the consent of his associate apostles and the first presidency in order to go before the legislature. He obtained that consent."

But the chief interest centered in the inquiry concerning the present status of polygamy. President Smith admitted that he himself has five living wives, all of whom have borne him children since the manifesto of 1890 by which polygamy was supposed to be done away when Utah was admitted into the Union. Most of the twelve apostles have plural wives and are supposed to be maintaining relations with them as formerly. Putting together the various items of President Smith's testimony, the following seem to be the facts about Mormonism and polygamy: Since 1890 both plural marriage and polygamous cohabitation have been contrary to the laws of Utah. In that year the federal government, as a condition of admitting Utah to the union, required that polygamy be prohibited. This was interpreted to mean that no new plural marriages might be entered into, but that former relations might be continued. The Mormon church, accordingly, repudiated the doctrine of polygamy, in President Woodruff's manifesto of 1890, though the authoritative books which proclaim polygamous marriage to be a divine institution are still circulated without amendment; but the church countenances polygamous cohabitation with plural wives married before 1890. President Smith admits that in this respect he and Mr. Smoot's fellow-apostles break the laws of their state. President Smith makes much of the fact that he could not honorably desert his children and set his plural families adrift in the world, even in obedience to a state law. The law does not ask that of him. But it does seem that the paternal regard which he professes for his children could scarcely compel him to continue to increase their number. He has forty-five now, and eleven have been born since the manifesto of 1890 was issued. The investigation continues.

The government of Colombia, acting through its agent, Gen. Reyes, who is now in Paris, has discontinued the legal proceedings by which it was trying to prevent the transfer of the Panama canal property to the United States, and it remains only for the legal advisers of our government to assure themselves of the title—and that was already practically done before the Panama route was agreed upon—and the money will then be paid and the work will begin. Of the fifty million dollars which must be paid out very shortly to the canal company and to the Republic of Panama, thirty million will be taken from the funds now deposited in those national banks in various parts of the country which serve as government depositories. As the sum needed is less than twenty per cent of the total amount so deposited, its withdrawal is not expected to have any considerable effect upon the money market. The remaining twenty million dollars will be paid out of the treasury itself, and when it has been paid, there will remain a working balance of nearly forty million dollars in the treasury. The call for the payment from the banks has already been issued, and it is expected that the transaction will be completed within thirty days.

It does not follow, however, that the actual work of excavation on the canal will commence at once. It would probably be politically desirable from the standpoint of the administration to have the work well under way before the election, but there are some preliminaries to be attended to, such as matters of sanitation, drainage and water supply. In our recent experience in Cuba and Porto Rico, we have learned something about the conditions of healthy living in the tropics, and it will be time and money well spent if the isthmus can be brought into a reasonably healthy condition before the work of excavation is commenced. It is estimated that from the time actual digging is commenced, it will require a force of at least forty thousand men for ten or twelve years to complete the canal.

Reclaiming the Desert. Commander Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army has a plan for colonizing the arid regions of the west with the overflow from the cities of the east. The plan has been embodied in a bill which has been prepared by Senator Fairbanks and is to be introduced in Congress. It proposes the creation of a Bureau of Colonization in the Department of the Interior. A fund of fifty million dollars, to be raised by the sale of three per cent bonds, is to be made available for loans to the settlers who take advantage of the law. It is said that a similar plan has been in operation for eight years in New Zealand—that laboratory of political and economic experiments—and that the government has never lost a cent of the eight million dollars which it has loaned to homesteaders. The difficult point in all these schemes for turning the tide of emigration from the cities to the country is that the people who would profit most by the change are the least willing to go. Every proposed readjustment of population must take account of the fact that city slums are inhabited chiefly by people who cannot earn a fair living in the city, but will not live anywhere else. Commander Booth-Tucker believes, however, that he can find enough who will follow his call to materially reduce the congestion in some of the most crowded quarters and to supply the deficiency of population in some of the unsettled regions. It is stated that just before his death Senator Hanna had agreed to become sponsor for this bill.

The Dawes Commission. Charles J. Bonaparte and Clinton R. Woodruff, who were appointed by the President to investigate the alleged misconduct of Indian affairs by the Dawes Commission, have filed their report. The report in the main substantiates the charges which were made by Mr. Brosius, agent of the Indian Rights Association, against Tams Bixby, president of the Dawes Commission, and Messrs. Breckenridge and Needles, members of the Commission. Congress is urged to take prompt and decisive steps to remedy the conditions, and it is recommended that the Dawes Commission be abolished. In transmitting this report to the President, Secretary Hitchcock concurs in the recommendations regarding the public officials who are connected with real estate firms and are using their official positions as a means of private gain, but he opposes the immediate abolition of the Dawes Commission. The President, in forwarding the document to Congress, calls attention to this latter statement of the secretary, and adds his own opinion that it is desirable to abolish the Dawes Commission if it shall be found possible. The report does not reveal any criminal action on the part of public officials, but shows such a confusion of public and private interests as to seriously impair the usefulness of several officials in the public service.

Sky-scrapers. The modern steel-framed office building or hotel, with its ten to twenty stories, has been much discussed from many points of view. Is it beautiful?—or rather, can it ever be made beautiful? Is it as permanent as brick and stone? Is it fire-proof? The great Chicago fire, thirty years ago, discredited the alleged fire-proof qualities of the iron-framed buildings. The recent Baltimore fire, which put all sorts of large buildings to the severest test possible, showed that the form of construction which is most nearly fire-proof is that in which a steel skeleton is encased in terra cotta walls. The terra cotta shell protects the framework from the extreme heat and the steel framework supports the building even though an occasional brick or block of terra cotta may be crumbled by the heat.

But there is another danger—one which is connected rather with the nature of man than with the structure of the sky-scraper. A few days ago in New York a ten-story hotel building, which was in process of erection, suddenly collapsed and seventeen workmen lost their lives in the ruin. None knows just why it fell; perhaps no one ever will know; but the chances are that the real secret of the disaster lay in dishonest work somewhere on the job. Iron is cheaper than steel. Light beams are cheaper than heavy ones. Everyone who has ever built a house knows that contractors are tempted above most other men and that some of them yield. And in these steel-framed buildings, whose vital structure is hidden under a shell of terra cotta, there are exceptional opportunities for dishonest and dangerous economies. The fact of it is, these finer types of buildings require a finer type of men to build them, and along with superior technical qualifications these must go superior ideals of personal and professional honor.

Fidelity with Fraternity.

During the larger part of our history, when our position was assailed by caricature and misrepresentation, and narrow-minded partisans thought they were doing God service in opposing us, there was a promptness and willingness to accept the gauge of battle, on the part of the defenders of our cause, that showed not only their confidence in the truth of that position, but their readiness to suffer and sacrifice for it. But now that the attitude of other religious bodies toward us has changed, and there is of necessity a corresponding change in our attitude toward them—a change which we doubt not has been brought about by the Spirit of God and is well-pleasing to our heavenly Father—a more difficult task is before us, namely: to maintain the same fidelity to principles and truths which we hold in trust for the world, within the bounds of fraternity and good will. This, if we mistake not, will be a severer test of our loyalty to a sacred trust, than we underwent in the period of conflict.

No one who has followed us in these articles, or who is an intelligent reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, will understand that by fidelity to the truths we hold in trust we mean a blind and bigoted devotion to a given position, which closes the mind to any new light that may break out from God's word. This is precisely the spirit which we have ever antagonized, as contrary to the free spirit of the gospel. What we do mean is that, if God has raised us up to teach the world certain truths and to accomplish a definite mission, He expects us to be true to that mission both through good report and through evil report. If His word and Spirit are leading us into fraternal relations with others of His children, He does not mean that we shall hide our light under a bushel, but rather His chief purpose, probably, in bringing us into this relationship is that we may let our light shine in a way that will be of the greatest service to others; while we, on the other hand, by cultivating an open mind, may also receive from the closer contact which comes from this fraternal relationship additional light from those who, like ourselves, do not exist without fitness to serve God's purpose in some way. We not only wrong ourselves, but we wrong others in not teaching and practicing those things for which we specially stand, and in the way most likely to win acceptance for them on the part of others.

There is an idea abroad in the world that there is something essentially antagonistic between fidelity to one's convictions and fraternity with those holding contrary views on certain points. This may be true with people in a low stage of civilization or spiritual development, who are unable to grasp the truth that fraternity is based not on uniformity of opinions, but on a deeper and more fundamental spiritual basis, even our common kinship in Christ. Several years ago the writer, in a sermon at one of our conventions, declared that he found two things growing side by side, in his own heart, as the years went by, namely: his appreciation of the great plea we were making for Christian union on the basis of a return to Christ and to the simple gospel, and his appreciation of the Christian character and work of other Christians who were not following with us, but who seemed to be used of God for the accomplishment of His purposes in the world. Some thought that was impossible, but the "more part" readily accepted the statement, finding its corroboration in their own experience. But it has never occurred to us for a moment that this recognition of the Christian worth of others released us from the obligation to be loyal to the truth as God gave us to see the truth. On the contrary it has seemed to us that this appreciation of others and their work is an essential condition of teaching them any new truth which they may not have learned.

Nevertheless, it is true that, because many confuse in their minds fraternity toward others with an easy-going indifference to truth, there is danger, in this new period of fraternity upon which we are entering, that some will be disposed to barter away what may be distinctive in our position, with the false idea that by so doing they are promoting the era of good feeling and unity. Nothing can be further from the truth than that unity is promoted by any compromise of truth, or by the surrender of honest convictions. The religious world has outgrown that stage of its being. Anybody whose good opinion is worth having, respects the man who is loyal to his conscience and to what he believes to be truth, far more than he does one who, like the school-teacher, is willing to teach that the earth is flat instead of round, if his patrons prefer it that way! Much as we love unity and fraternity, we are free to say that, if they were to be purchased by the sacrifice of conscience or honest convictions of truth, we would have none of them. We would rather stand alone with God and our conscience, than with the multitude whose good-will has been bought by being false to the light which God has given us.

This, then, is our point: If God's Spirit is leading us into more fraternal relations and co-operative efforts with our religious neighbors, as we doubt not He is, His purpose in so doing is that, by being true and loyal to the truth He has raised us up to emphasize, we may convey this truth more effectually. He would remove the barriers of hatred, strife and sectarian animosity among His people that they each may bless the other according to the measure of light they possess. And though the temptation may be greater now than formerly, to be silent on all matters of difference, yet the duty and the obligation is clear for us to "speak the truth in love," as brother to brother, both for conscience's sake and our brother's sake. To be fraternal to all who love Christ, while we are loyal to all the truth which Christ has taught us, will be an achievement that will mark a distinct growth in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, and will furnish further proof that we are being led of God toward the fulfillment of our mission in the world.

Union Among Presbyterians.

The union of the Presbyterian Church in the United States and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, has proceeded so far as the agreement, by the Joint Committee appointed by the two bodies, on the basis of union. It only remains for the two Assemblies to approve this basis, and then for the various presbyteries to give it their sanction for the union to go into effect. The probability is that the action of the joint committees will be approved and that we shall have at least one less division in the church. It is worth while to note that this is a re-union of bodies which once constituted but one body of Presbyterians. The division occurred more than a century ago, and the chief points of difference was the doctrine of election and predestination, as defined in the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the ministerial standard of education as an essential condition of becoming a minister of the gospel. The late revision of the Confession of Faith, and the modification of sentiment as regards the rigidity of the rule in reference to theological training, have made the re-union possible. The following are the statistics given of the two bodies as they stand at present: The Presbyterian Church has 7,361 ministers, 7,552 churches, and 1,024,196 communicants in the United States. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church has 1,595 white and 450 colored ministers, 2,944 white and 400 colored churches, and 184,493 white, and 39,000 colored communicants.

This union movement among our Presbyterian brethren is indicative of the union spirit that is at work among the churches. It shows that the centripetal forces now at work are stronger than the centrifugal, and we may anticipate further re-unions of this kind as preliminary to a closer union of the larger and more divergent bodies of Christendom. Those religious bodies having creeds or confessions of faith as their bases of fellowship, even though these creeds may differ somewhat, form one class that might be united by a little adjustment and modification of their respective symbols. On the other hand those bodies which recognize the sufficiency of the Scriptures and the autonomy of the local churches, form another class that might more readily see their way to come together. In other words the difference on the creed question—that is, as to whether any other basis of union and fellowship than that presented in the Scriptures themselves is permissible—is a wider gulf of separation than any difference in the statements of the various creeds. The characteristic feature of our own movement for union was that, instead of formulating a creed embodying its conception of the basis of union, it discarded all human formulations of doctrine, as possessing any divine authority, and went back to the original basis of fellowship and the original foundation of the church—the Christ-hood and divinity of Jesus of Nazareth—with the Scriptures alone as a sufficient interpretation of what is involved in that creed. Time has but demonstrated the wisdom of this plan. No one now expects to see the reunion of Christendom on any uninspired creed. To believe in the possibility of ultimate Christian union is to believe in the practicability of dispensing with human formulations of doctrine and uniting on the creed, of which Jesus said: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father who is in heaven."

The Foreign Offering.

The following telegram comes from the corresponding secretary of the Foreign Society:

INDIANAPOLIS, March 6.

Reported heavy rains over the country to-day. Please request churches to continue the offering next Sunday. F. M. RAINS.

If we could have F. M. Rains all over the country on the first Lord's day in March, the success of the offering would be assured; but the other sort is less conducive to large audiences and liberal responses. Surely we will not allow the weather to interfere with our duty in world-wide evangelization. If storms prevented a full attendance of our membership on the appointed day for the offering, let the offering be repeated on the next Lord's day. Canvass the absentees if any are absent when the offering is taken. See to it that every one has a fair chance to give. More than that, see to it that no one has a fair chance to avoid giving. Use as much time as may be necessary during March to make effective the foreign missionary appeal by gathering up the offering.

Whether Kentucky escaped the inclement weather on last Sunday or rose superior to it, we do not know, but here is a telegram which indicates that one church has made a splendid showing, storm or no storm:

WINCHESTER, KY., March 6.

Winchester, Ky., offering for foreign missions seven hundred and fifty dollars.

CECIL J. ARMSTRONG, Pastor.

Another telegram reads:

CLEVELAND, O., March 6.

Jefferson Street, Fort Wayne, stays in the Living Link line with offering of five hundred dollars for foreign missions to-day, continuing the support of Stella Franklin. I am now on my way to Palestine.

E. W. ALLEN, Pastor.

After such a day as that a pastor can start for Palestine with a clear conscience and a good taste in his mouth. And we not not see how any pastor can turn his attention to anything else with a clear conscience until he has brought his congregation, if not up to the point of being a living link, at least up to the full measure of its duty and ability for the cause of foreign missions.

Remember, the day for the foreign offering should never be considered as past until the best possible offering has been taken.

Editor's Easy Chair.

On Biscayne Bay.

Somehow this far southland seems steeped in the spirit of romance. If we ever decide to comply with a request that has come to us to write a novel before we close our literary work, we shall probably gather the inspiration for it here on the shore of Biscayne Bay. There is something in this balmy air, these bright, sunny days and moon-lit nights, the beautiful waters of the bay, the singing pines and the rustling palms to stir the sentiment and quicken the pulse-beat of any one not too old to be in sympathy with life or to remember the emotions and aspirations of the young. A few days ago, while sailing over the crystal waters of the bay, we chanced to hum a tune of the olden time—one that carried us back to the days of our youth, and immediately the feelings, impulses and ambitions of youth came back to us. And then we remembered that these were, for us, in the far past, and there was a moment of sadness, until we could call up the compensations of increasing years. But Oh! the rich dower of the young! Would that they understood and appreciated what latent possibilities lie in that possession!

What a glorious night this is! The full moon hangs over the bay, and across its silvery pathway the sailing vessels pass like phantom ships. The floating white clouds above—the ships of the upper air—follow the invisible currents to their distant ports. The soft night wind sways the branches of palm, palmetto and pine. The air is fragrant with the odor of orange blossoms. On such a night it seems a profanation to sleep! One feels the impulse to go forth under the starry heavens, either alone or with one closest to his inmost soul, and speak heart to heart from the purest and best there is in him. What one misses here is the music of the waves, as the quiet waters of the bay send up no ceaseless anthem of praise, but only smile back at the Creator whose smile lights up their placid surface. The song of the pines is the nearest substitute for the music of the billows. To some this is gain. The moaning of the sea brings sadness to them. It seems to be a requiem over the millions it has devoured since man began his efforts to master it. But we love the resounding notes of "the deep-heaving sea," and the thunder of the wild waves as they beat on the shore. But to-night the scene is one of quiet beauty and peace, and we love that, too.

For a few days we have been indulging in a new experience. The editor was born and reared on the farm, and to cultivate the soil, strip the fodder, gather in and husk the corn, cradle and bind and shock and thresh the wheat and oats, were among his earliest lessons. But cultivating the soil in Dade County, Florida, is altogether different. Raising oranges, grape-fruit, lemons, limes, mangoes, and other tropical fruits is quite another kind of business, from that of raising corn, wheat, oats, potatoes, etc. And the soil in which we work here is quite as different from that which we plowed in boyhood, as are its products from those we helped to raise in Southwest Missouri. Dynamite is the Dade County cultivator. With it the stumps are blown out of the ground, the coral limestone is pulverized, holes are blasted out in which the young trees are planted, and the way for the plow is opened up. What the dynamite leaves undone the fire accomplishes, devouring the shivered stumps of the trees, and making an excellent quality of lime out of the stone that is blown out. To this must be added the digging up of the scrub palmetto, which is mostly roots. Such is opening up a farm in Dade County. A domain of one and a half acres quite satisfies our ambition! But when you have once conquered these natural obstacles, it is done, and the reward is sure if one has patience to labor and wait.

Meanwhile you have the climate! That, after all, is the main thing. We have been here three weeks to-day, and there has not been one hour of unpleasant weather, nor a single cloudy day within that time. Just now the cloudy day, with abundance of rain, is what is needed. Of course there are unpleasant days here, but in no place we have ever been have we seen so few, and this season we have missed them entirely so far. Florida has a great future, materially. It is the duty of the Christian people of the whole country to see to it that its moral and religious development shall keep pace with its material progress. The Disciples of Christ are not strong in this state, but they have made an encouraging advance within the last few years. We hope to attend the state convention at Tampa, which we now learn is to be held March 22-24, and learn more of the condition of our cause in the state. J. P. Rowleson is at Tampa, and J. B. Corwine has recently come to Ocala. These are newcomers in the state, and are strong men. Evangelist James Small has begun a series of evangelistic meetings at Jacksonville, with Bro. J. T. Boone, which promises good results.

May the Easy Chair, even down here amid the scent of orange blossoms, be permitted to express its deep solicitude that the matter of our exhibit at the World's Fair be carried out with a zeal, a liberality and a degree of enterprise that will do credit to our noble cause? There is not a day to lose, and we have gone too far to turn back without the stigma of failure resting upon us. We must not fail; we cannot afford to fail. Let us do heartily and promptly, what we have set our hands to do.

Questions and Answers.

Please explain the expression "and who shall declare his generation."—Isaiah 53:8. J. A. S.

The expression may more easily be explained if the corrected translation in the Revised Version or American Revised Version be used. The American Revised Version is as follows: "By oppression and judgment he was taken away, and as for his generation who among them considered that he was cut off out of the living for the transgressions of my people, to whom the stroke was due." The verse may be paraphrased as follows: By injustice under the guise of law, he was put out of the way, and who of his contemporaries understood that his death was not a punishment for his own misdeeds, but for the sake of sinful men who deserved punishment.

I have noticed in several religious papers this advertisement: "$75,000 given away to arouse interest in, and to advertise the great St. Louis World's Fair," etc. Does this not come under the head of gambling, or is it considered lawful? Would you think it right for a Christian to patronize the scheme?

The positive statement contained in the above is obviously false. No one is giving away $75,000 to arouse interest in and advertise the St. Louis World's Fair. It is possible that some firm whose business made it desirable to have a large number of names and addresses, might give away a considerable sum to get such names. It may not be known to the general public that there is a large class of business houses whose most valuable asset is what they call a "sucker list"—that is a list of persons who have been known to bite on free propositions of this and similar sorts. Whether this particular scheme is gambling or not, we do not know. If it is, the chances are that the dice are loaded.

In your poem, "What We Stand For," you use the expression, "For the weak against the strong." What do you mean by against? Does it mean an encouragement of the uprising of the poor against the rich? This may be poetic license, but it might lead to license not poetic. Would it not be better "for the weak as well as strong?" W. H. W.

It is of course not always true that the weak are always right, or that the under dog deserves our sympathy, but it is a fact that in our present imperfect stage of civilization, those who are strong use their strength selfishly to encroach on the rights of the weak. So long as that condition remains, we are "For the weak against the strong," to help the weak to recover that degree of opportunity and advantage which rightfully belongs to them. No anarchistic or revolutionary sentiment is intended.

1. Was the whole of the First Epistle of John addressed to the church universal, or was the epistle in the first chapter speaking to unbelievers?

2. Do the editors of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST believe that Jesus Christ was the actual Son of God as taught in the first chapter of Matthew?

1. There is no adequate ground for breaking the unity of John's First Epistle, and it seems clear to us that it was all addressed to believers.

2. They do.

1. Can John 3:5 be construed otherwise than to mean baptism? Is there any reason why "water" might here mean the "word of God?"

2. Does not John 3:16 seem to say that faith is all that is necessary for salvation?

1. There have been many attempts to eliminate the reference to baptism from John 3:5. They have all been unsuccessful. There is no more reason for interpreting water as the word of God in this passage, than for giving it any other interpretation which the fancy may suggest. On the other hand, we do not think that Jesus was in this passage teaching the duty or necessity of Christian baptism. Christian baptism could not exist until after the death of Christ and the beginning of the Christian dispensation. Jesus was rather reverting to the baptism of righteousness or John's baptism, and meant to say that one must not only be born of water, that is, the baptism of repentance which had already become fairly familiar, but must also be born of the spirit before he could enter the kingdom of God.

2. In that whole class of passages in which salvation is apparently conditioned only upon faith, it is necessary to understand the term faith as including not simply the act of intellectual belief ("for the devils also believe and tremble"), but as involving that whole attitude of soul and the life of obedience which naturally follows as the correlary of genuine faith. Faith is considered not as the condition upon which salvation is bestowed, but as the gateway by which one enters upon the path which leads to salvation.

Notes and Comments.

Our Methodist brethren have found that the requirement of a fixed period of probation before admitting candidates to church membership is awkward and unsatisfactory. Since scientific criminology favors the "indeterminate sentence," why not try indeterminate probation? The period could then be varied according to the needs of the individual case. After all, the whole policy of probation, while it may follow "the historic practice of the Christian Church," as a recent Methodist writer says, scarcely goes back to the days when "the Lord added to them daily those that were being saved."

A recent critic of the Disciples of Christ, Dr. David Utter, of Denver, says of our movement:

It is a country religion, root and branch, origin and history, quality and substance. . . . As a sect, the Disciples find themselves at a disadvantage among city people. If they insist on baptism for the remission of sins, they are out of harmony with modern Christian thought; they seem dogmatic and narrow, they can not present their faith as rational. . . . Moreover, the country members who come into the city miss the old message and the old fervor and accuse the educated minister of becoming worldly and falling away from the faith. They did a great work in the sparsely settled west last century, they upheld religion, stimulated free inquiry, they helped more than anybody else to break the old iron bound creeds; their work was a mighty influence making for freedom and reason in religion, but it is doubtful whether as an organization they can follow their tendencies to their legitimate conclusions.

To be a country religion is perhaps not a bad thing, so far as it goes. In fact, we are rather proud of it. But it occurs to us that a movement which has been a "mighty influence for freedom and reason in religion" in the country ought not to be wholly impotent in the city. And it is not. The movement and the plea are good for city and country alike. But until comparatively recent years we have had an insufficient supply of city-trained men to represent us adequately in the cities. One must know city conditions and understand city people to work successfully in the city, as one must know country conditions to work successfully in the country.

But speaking of our growth in the cities, however, we are not doing so badly. Taking a list of seventeen leading cities and comparing their statistics for 1891 with those for 1902, we find that the number both of churches and of members has considerably more than doubled in the eleven years. Unitarianism—the faith with which Dr. Utter is identified,—is a distinctively urban religion and has great resources of wealth and culture. But it shows a smaller percentage of growth for the entire half century from 1840 to 1890 than our city work shows in eleven years. There must be a weak spot somewhere in Dr. Utter's argument.

Verbeck of Japan By Alva W. Taylor

Until William Elliot Griffis wrote his life of Verbeck of Japan three years ago, little was known of the part this quiet but able man had played in the transformation of that remarkable land that has demanded so much of the world's attention and admiration for the last three decades, and is today the cynosure of all eyes. The Japanese themselves knew little of it although he was for two decades the trusted advisor of the men who effected the revolution. "Tell no man" was Verbeck's motto, and it was recognized as the best policy by even the most grateful of his friends. The Japanese are a proud and sensitive people, and prudence on the part of all and the further motive in our hero's heart that love of Japan was greater than love of self forbade him revealing the part he played in the reconstruction. He did once modestly remark that the fact he worked in silence, seldom volunteered advice and never asked personal favors was the reason he was consulted when others were not.

Verbeck was born in Holland and taught the art of civil engineering. He came to America as a youth as to a land of opportunity, but Perry's doings in Yokohama harbor opened to him larger opportunities in that little known land and he accepted a commission to go out in the first party of missionaries sent. There were a few Dutchmen living on an island in Nagasaki harbor and it was thought a Hollander would have some advantages, but alas, as is too often the case, those who go for gain prove no friends to those who go for good.

The little party of three landed in Nagasaki in 1859, and could do naught but study, watch and wait. Verbeck found opportunity to quietly instruct two young men, and thus began the work that makes him famous in the annals of New Japan. At the end of six years he had secretly baptized two, an act which they did at the risk of their lives, for Christianity had been under interdict for two centuries, ever since the Jesuits had blunderingly tried to dominate the land with Popedom, and now that trade with foreigners was beginning, the ban was the more pronounced. But the school grew and the future makers of Japan were in it. The teaching of Christianity was forbidden but Verbeck, with grim determination, used the Bible and the Constitution of the United States as text books for the teaching of English.

At the end of the first decade the upheaval began, and pupils of the son of Grotius and Jefferson turned to their master for advice. For another decade the country was in a state of war, and for the last two years of it in actual armed revolution, but at the end New Japan had won. It was a victory by the students, and foremost among them were those from the Nagasaki school. The Mikado was restored to power, the feudal lords laid their authority at his feet, government by public opinion was decreed and the policy of learning everything possible from everywhere possible adopted. An era of education began and Verbeck was called to Tokio to found the Imperial University. At the end of the first year he had five hundred students. Yet the reactionaries were powerful and things hung in the balance for a time. It was the minority of intelligence and progress that was in control and the bloody hand of assassination was often raised against it. Foreigners were not wanted and Christianity was put under even more severe interdict and rewards offered for the apprehension of any who might profess it. The penalty was death.

Verbeck quietly advises the sending of young men to America and secures several to go. He obtained places for six at Annapolis. He toils to break prejudice and becomes chief advisor to Iwakura, the leader in that early time, and of Count Okuma, one of his own pupils, who has to this day been one of the leading men of the empire.

He translates Blackstone, Wheaton and works on political economy, advises the formation of an army, counsels the establishment of a postal system, the building of light-houses, and the founding of modern schools. His parlor at the university becomes a veritable council chamber for the officials of the Imperial Government and he is even invited into the presence of the Mikado who now, for the first time in centuries, was seen of his subjects. He received invitations to visit the princes in various parts of the empire for the purpose of advising in the development of the resources of their lands. He could not go but they came and his scientific training stood him in good account. He was appealed to for so many things that he sat through many nights seeking the information that was needful. Great was his gratification when he was asked to furnish missionaries for teachers, for they only could be trusted, said they. The first battle was won.

All this time Verbeck was supervising a translation of the Bible from the Chinese and letting no opportunity escape to get the interdict against Christianity removed. His great plan now is an official embassy to America and Europe. His advice lay unacted upon two years until Okuma and Iwakura saw the time was ripe. Verbeck planned the route and was accorded the distinction of naming two of the representatives. The second battle was won, and soon the victory for the embassy telegraphed from the States that the great motive power of Western progress was Christianity, and the decrees against it, posted all over the empire, came down like magic. The beginning of things seemed accomplished, and after fourteen years of untiring service, amid so many dangers, our missionary turned his face toward the lands of his birth and of his inspiration. In six months he is back to that of his adoption.

Just before leaving on this short furlough a most interesting thing transpired in the light of present day events. A council, lasting many hours, was held in Verbeck's house in which he advised the fortification of the coast and the building of an efficient navy. His reasons were found in the aggressive policies of Russia, France and England in the Far East.

A Senate is now formed as an advisory body to the Mikado, and Verbeck is made a sort of official advisor to it. He translates the Code Napoleon, the Constitutions of Europe and legal forms and documents innumerable. All the time he is preaching every Sunday and working laboriously on a translation of the Bible. After five years he desires release from official duties that all his time may be devoted to those of the missionary, but is persuaded to stay on from month to month. At last, however, he secures release with the exception of lecturing twice per week at the school for the sons of the nobility, specifying that his topic must be ethics. He begins teaching in the new theological school and to travel over the empire preaching. Large audiences greet him, and his facility in the language and aptness at quoting their authors, make his sermons of unusual attraction. Upon retiring from official life the Mikado had decorated him and the Japanese desired to advertise his coming here and there with this notable fact, but Verbeck refused to come until every poster was torn down.

The Mikado announced that he would grant a Parliament in 1900, and Verbeck was importuned to lecture upon and teach political subjects. So many of his pupils had attained to high station that many thought his instruction was the best guarantee of position. This he resolutely refused to do, but continued to preach and translate religious works.

His last work for Japan was to write an address to the Mikado for the presentation of a copy of the Bible in the translation of which he had borne so important a part. In 1898 he departed from this world in the same quiet way he had done all things in it. He was buried at the Mikado's expense and a soldier's salute was fired over his grave as a mark of national honor. Every year he had been accorded a reception by the Mikado, and it was his official right to attend all affairs of State, but the rearing of his monument by the Japanese people and his Master's "Well Done" are the greatest tributes to his worth.

Fighting the Blind Tigers By William Durban

A note just to hand from Bro. E. M. Todd, now stationed as preacher at the Church of Christ, Fulham, says, "We are expecting the bailiffs in our house every day!" This shows that our brother has taken his place amongst the stalwarts who have refused, as Passive Resisters, to pay the education rate, from conscientious scruples. American readers who have followed the progress of the current struggle in England are aware that the whole of England outside London has been for over a year involved in this fight against the act, and that London is only just now to have its turn. For two education acts were passed, a separate one being reserved for London, a year later another for the rest of the land. This Tory government, of which Mr. Balfour, nephew of Lord Salisbury, is the supercilious head, delivered itself and the nation into the grasp of a proud, selfish, and exacting hierarchy—the priesthood of the Established Church. The Church of England and the government have been playing into each others hands, with disastrous results for the cause of civil and religious liberty. The Church of England was to back the Tories, and the Tories were to make the church paramount in the matter of national education. But half the nation is in rebellion against this recrudescence of mediæval tyranny. Thousands are refusing to give the tax-collector the rate, because it is levied for the purpose of paying the expense of education mixed with priestly and sem-popish doctrine administered to the boys and girls. The children of Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists and Presbyterians will be poisoned by the decoctions of divinity imported from the Pope's kitchen.

One of the Victims.

A concrete instance of persecution, which has just come very closely home to myself, will furnish a lurid illustration of the persecution which is in process. Some of the Passive Resisters not only refuse to pay the rate, but also resist the entry of the bailiffs into their houses. The result of such defiance of an unjust law is condemnation to imprisonment. Accordingly, many of the best men in England are one by one being cast into prison cells, under the same gloomy roofs with criminals and felons, with thieves and forgers, with drunkards and ruffians guilty of deeds of violence. And this incarceration is no mere nominal punishment, such as is meted out to prisoners for usual political offenses, which in this country are reckoned in a peculiar category, styled "first class misdemeanments." Such offenders as merely contravene political law, without committing any crime in other senses, are, according to custom, secluded in comfortable apartments; allowed to see their friends; to be supplied by their families with good food; and to pursue habits of study under supervision. Mr. W. T. Stead was treated so during his celebrated experience. But these Passive Resisters, men of God honored in the free churches, are the subjects of infamous harshness. When I was pastor of Tasso Tabernacle, Fulham, in West London, (the sanctuary where Eli Brearley, formerly of Birkenhead, now so energetically ministers) I baptized a convert named O'Connor, one of a number of cabmen who were brought to Christ during the same period and were part of my great joy in the work of Christ. Brother O'Connor soon afterward went into business on his own account, and God so abundantly blessed him that he rapidly gained great success, becoming possessed of many horses and cabs. The more he prospered, the more devoted he showed himself to the church, and also to the good of his fellow citizens, interesting himself in public affairs so assiduously that he was chosen alderman by the Borough Council of his district of London.

Our Alderman in Gaol.

On Jan. 23 Alderman O'Connor was arrested while on his way to preside at an anniversary service at a little country chapel about 30 miles from London, at the village of Battlesbridge, in the county of Essex. The police hauled him to Chelmsford Gaol. Here he was made to strip stark naked on a cold floor and his clothing was taken from him. In company with other prisoners he was made to take a bath, and was not allowed to change his underclothing for clean ones sent him until the morning of his release, nor allowed to have food sent or purchased for him. He was obliged to rise at half-past five every morning with the other prisoners, and partook of prison fare. The bread was sour. The dinner he was scarcely able to touch the whole time. The suet pudding was a study in lumps of white suet and black flour. During the day Alderman O'Connor was made to pick oakum in common with the other prisoners. The chaplain at was first very abrupt, but one day he spent over two hours with the prisoner in the cell, and finished up by praying for the removal of the education bill from the statute book. Among the books placed in the cell was a famous ritualist manual, "The Narrow Way." After the release of my friend from Gaol, he was given a breakfast at the Chelmsford Temperance Hotel by the Passive Resisters of the district. A large open air meeting followed opposite the Shire Hall.

The Blind Tigers.

Thus, as you American friends have to fight sets of people whom you distinguish by the name of Blind Tigers, we also on this side of the Atlantic are engaged in a conflict with a very formidable set of enemies, who are blind to the true interests of their own church, and are fiercely attacking the principles of civil and religious freedom which raised their country out of the slough of ecclesiastical despotism. The blind tigers of bigotry are raging against the Reformation. They have formed common cause with the great Bacchanalian conspiracy also, for they are in league against Nonconformists with the governments, which is now on the eve of bringing in a great bill for the benefit of the brewers and drink-sellers. But many in this country see that the issue will be a very different one from that which these obscurantists design to bring about. For those who are calmly taking stock of the prospect predict that a tremendous reaction will ensue before long, and that the ultimate result will be the precipitation of the disestablishment fight which has so often been threatened, but has been continually postponed by other issues. When we see one of our own best representatives rushed into gaol, because of his bold adoption of the policy which his duty to God and man dictated to his conscience, we all become immediately concerned. I may here observe that Alderman O'Connor was not imprisoned as a London Passive Resister, because his resistance to the operation of the obnoxious act related to his refusal to pay the rate levied on some of his country property. Londoners have their turn to come. I will also remark that though Nonconformists generally are bitterly opposed to the act, all are not agreed as to the method of opposition. All are not Passive Resisters. Many say that the proper plan is to overthrow the government and to bring a liberal government into power. But British politics are at this crisis in such terrible chaos that the Liberals find themselves without any recognized leader, and this is the real reason why so many are resisting individually. The issue has been confused for the Tories also by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's protectionist campaign. This has flung his own party into utter confusion, and Tories, Liberals, Radicals, Socialists and the Labor Party are all alike muddled in a hopeless fog. What England now lacks is great pilots for each party. We have too many programs and too few men competent to carry any of them out.

The Conservative Split.

What has Mr. Chamberlain done? He has for the second time in his career wrecked a great political party. He it was who was mainly responsible for the destruction of the Gladstonian regime. He led the secession over the

The Minister's Vacation

By Mrs. May
Griggs VanVoorhis

"Do you know, Mary," said the minister to his young wife, "I have found just the place for us to spend our summer vacation."

They were lingering over the breakfast table, as they often did on Monday morning, before plunging into the work of the week. It was one of those bright, sunny June mornings when all nature is on a holiday, and seems to call us forth from labor and worry to the joyous, care-free life of the fields and streams and woods. They had passed a successful, but intensely busy year, these two young people. They had come into helpful contact with many a care-burdened life; they had turned the weak and sinful from paths of temptation and wrong; and their cozy home, with its large, sunny rooms, and its hospitable table, was a beautiful memory in many a lonely heart. But now that the warm summer days were coming the burdens of the year weighed heavily upon their young shoulders, and they felt the need of rest.

"I heard about it yesterday," the minister continued, "when I was down in the country preaching for that little church at Rossby. About two miles from the village, in a beautiful stretch of woodland, on the bank of a pretty stream, is a little two-roomed cabin. A family from the city built it, I understand, expecting to spend their summer vacations there; but this year they are going to Europe, so the rustic home is for rent at a reasonable sum. When I heard about it and saw the little house nestling down among the great forest trees, I said to myself, 'Now here is the very place where Mary and I can spend four happy weeks in quiet, simple, outdoor life. We can take along what few things we absolutely need, and live at ease, with nothing to do but play and think and read.' What do you think, Mary?"

The fair face of the little woman across the table had brightened perceptibly. "What a boy you are to plan delightful times," she said, gayly. "What could be nicer than four long weeks alone in the woods?"

"You are sure that you won't be lonely?"

"Lonely?—no, indeed. There'll be walks and rambles and fishing and boating, and long hours of reading under the trees. And best of all, we'll be alone, far away from this never-ceasing noise and confusion. Oh, four weeks won't be half enough. Of course we'll take the hammock, John, and the little wicker rocker and two cot beds." Then followed an hour of merry planning, and when they separated for the day's work, it was with happy anticipations of their summer frolic.

Three weeks later, a warm July day found the minister and his wife busy and happy fitting up their cabin home.

It was indeed a lovely spot where the little house stood. A pretty stream, sparkling in the sunlight and dark blue in the shadow, with here and there the gleam of a fish darting to and fro, dashed by the very door. A motherly old elm spread its wide arms lovingly over their little home, and its rustling leaves seemed to whisper a kindly welcome to the new comers. On the surrounding hillsides stood the giant oak, the graceful maple and the beech with its drooping branches. Not a house was in sight, and all was silent save those dreamy, restful, woodland voices that chirp and buzz and hum on every hand. It was but a few hours' work to set the two simple rooms in order, and long before sunset the little house had taken on a very homelike aspect. How sweet it was, that first evening in the wood, to sit in the cabin doorway and watch the great shadows lengthen until they mingled into one dense gloom; to see the little brook, a silver thread in the gathering dusk, but joyous and rippling still, going on its way; to feel the kisses of the rising evening breeze and hear its rustling whisper through the branches, and to listen to the drowsy, goodnight chirping of the birds. Yes, this is living, this silent communion with nature, far away from all that grates and jars and wears one's life away. As they closed their cabin that night the minister's wife declared, with a happy, girlish light in her lovely eyes that she had never been so happy in her life.

Day by day passed quietly away. There was very little real work to do. The two rooms, with their scant furniture, were a decided contrast to the big, well-furnished house that took so much of the young wife's time at home. There were no sermons to write, for God himself speaks in the voices of the forest; and there were no calls to make, for the creatures of the wood go their own way and fight their own battles without the bungling sympathy of man. After the simple morning meal they wandered away together, or the wife stayed at home to read and sew, while the husband ranged the wood alone. He sometimes took his fishing rod along, but he had too much sympathy with suffering in any form to gain much enjoyment from that which brought pain to any living thing.

It was a beautiful, restful, carefree life, and yet—and yet. As the days went by a half unconscious, wholly unacknowledged yearning began to take possession of their hearts. They had every chance for rest, but they could not shake off the full busy life in which, after all, they had been so happy. As the twilight of evening fell, they found themselves wondering about this friend and that, who had depended upon them in the glad, old days for sympathy and help. The din of the city, and the burden of responsibility were obscured by the thought of serving others. But they shook off these musings with a sad, little sigh, and said to each other again and again what a glorious time they were having.

One sunny afternoon as the minister sat alone in a pretty ravine, he was roused from the book that he was reading by a cry, the despairing cry of a bird. He turned and saw a mother robin hopping to and fro, and giving vent to bitter cries of distress. At her side, on the fresh, green grass, lay a baby bird, quite dead. It must have fallen from the nest in the first attempt of the little wings to fly.

"Poor little mother," he said, in a voice so gentle and full of pity that the bird was not frightened away, but continued her plaintive note. And then, in a flash of memory, he thought of a cottage near his own pleasant home. He remembered how, the winter before, a birdling had slipped from that nest, never to return. Who was comforting those poor young parents now? Did they miss his frequent visits and the sweet flowers that his thoughtful wife so loved to send? How he longed for the old busy life once more with its many opportunities to comfort, help and strengthen.

"Pshaw, I'm letting a little bird make me gloomy," he said to himself with a short laugh, brushing a great shining drop from the page of the book which he was reading. As he neared their cabin home that evening he saw his pretty wife sitting in the doorway. She had dropped her embroidery work into her lap, and her deeply, dreamy eyes showed that her thoughts were far away.

"A penny for your thoughts, little woman," he said, coming down the path to the door. She looked up, and a deep blush overspread her face. "I was just wondering," she said hesitatingly, "whether anyone reads to old Grandma Goodwin now. I was wondering whether she missed me just a little bit, John." He made no answer, but kissed her earnest face with a new, deep tenderness.

Well, these four weeks passed away, as all weeks must, and one sunshiny Saturday afternoon found them back in their own city home once more. The minister sat by the open window looking down into the street. He heard a light step at the door, and his wife entered the room. "I have been airing the rooms, John," she said, "and taking a peep into the chests and drawers and making myself at home again. I ran over to see Grandma Goodwin a few minutes, too, and do you know, John, she was so glad to see me that she burst out crying." The minister's wife was very near crying herself, but she laughed instead, and went on, hurriedly. "Are you glad to be back, too, John, or do you miss your woodland home?"

"Gladder than you can think, little wife," he replied. "That was rest, and very sweet it was while we needed it; but this——"

He paused, and taking her hand in his he drew her to his side at the window. It was six o'clock, and the street below was crowded. There was the laboring man with his dinner pail, and his tired but strong, patient face; there was the business man, whose quick step and intent eye showed that he was still pondering over the problems of the day; there was the man out of work with his listless step, his wan eye and pallid, joyless features; there was the school teacher, alert and quick, but with a weary, over-burdened look in her brave young eyes; there was the mother, bearing the sleeping babe in her arms, and gently urging onward the tired little toddler at her side. All with their problems, all with their ambitions, aspirations and great possibilities.

"This," said the minister softly, "this is life, Mary."

The Denial of Self

BY PRESTON BELL HALL.

"If any man wishes to go where I go, he must renounce self, take up his cross, and follow me."

Jesus was in the shadow of his own cross when he said this. He was going the way of renunciation and crucifixion to resurrection and glory, and to go where he was going one must go along the way he was going.

A lady said, "I should have enjoyed the sermon much more but for a large hat in front of me which hid the face of the preacher. I like to see the speaker." That is true of a good many people—they must see the face of the preacher to enjoy his sermon. It is true, also, that many professed disciples of the Master do not have any joy in him because they never see him nor hear him. That which gets between the disciple and his Master is self. This is the black shadow of evil that covers all beauty and obscures all the sunshine of love. It dispels all the joy and peace that is a Christian's inheritance. The last enemy to be destroyed in a believer is self. It dies hard. In its struggle to live it assumes the brightness of an angel, the piety of a saint, and strives to keep an outward form of religion when the heart is full of the love of the world.

What is self? It is the sum of one's individuality. It is the I AM of conscious being centered in its own thought and feeling, refusing to blend with humanity in the fellowship of interest or with God in the fellowship of being. Self is isolated egoism. It is compounded with innumerable things, and changes all of them into its own image. Interest becomes self-interest; pleasing, self-pleasing; praise, self-praise; love, self-love. It also changes the meaning of many words. Goodness is changed into badness; righteousness into self righteousness; liberality into penuriousness; humility into pride; the glory of God into glorification of self. What a wretched condition!

"Oh, the bitter pain and sorrow
That a time could ever be,
When we proudly say to Jesus,
All of self and none of Thee."

In contrast with love, self is impatient and unkind; self is envious; self vaunteth itself, is puffed up, does not behave itself seemly, seeketh its own, is easily provoked, thinketh evil; rejoiceth in iniquity, but rejoiceth not in the truth; beareth nothing, believeth nothing, hopeth nothing, endureth nothing. Self is never reliable. It fails in every contest of truth with error, in every battle for righteousness and purity. It speaks as a child, understands as a child, thinks as a child. Self never puts away childish things. It sees through a glass darkly, but avows it sees face to face. It knows imperfectly, but claims to know even as it is known. With self abide unbelief, despair, hate, these three; but the worst of these is hate.

Follow after hate and desire fleshly lust and you will have insomnia, invalidism and insanity. There will be disorder and derangement in the whole physical, mental, and spiritual condition. Self multiplies excuses, tries to justify itself, is sensitive to fancied slights, exacting of others, but shirks all responsibility. Self insults others but never apologizes. It wants the chief seat in the synagogue, puts the smallest coin on the contribution plate, times the preacher's sermon, and generously applies it to its neighbor. Self is the autocrat in the home, the plutocrat in the market, and the aristocrat in society.

Self must die. It is impossible to be a good Christian when self rules the heart. Dying to self is a poetic expression. It sounds romantic, heroic, chivalrous. It is beautiful to read about, easy to talk about, fascinating to write about. But it is hard to do. There's the rub. But it must be done. There can be no abiding peace, no spiritual power or prosperous Christian work without dying to self.

We die to self by denying self. We must deny the power of self. It is not our master, it shall not be our master. Christ is our Master, and to self we must say, "Out of my way, Satan! You are a hindrance to me; you look at things not in God's way but in man's."

We deny self by refusing to gratify any desire of self. Self fattens on indulgence. It says, "Let us eat and drink; let us make merry in wine; let us 'cut a swell' and disregard the feelings of decent folks." This unclean beast; this eating, drinking, smoking, gambling beast will devour the child of God, the immortal soul, if his voracious appetite is gratified.

We deny self by taking up our crosses. We have come to the dividing of the ways. Jesus says, "Come, follow Me." Self says, "If you follow Him He will give you a cross. Take the easier way. God is too good to condemn you for a life of ease. If you are only a decent fellow, you will be all right." Jesus says, "Yes, I will give you a cross. Upon your cross self will die. Then you will enter into the joy of your Lord."

In the death of self we find life. He that loathes his life of self will find the life of God. Then will be the joyful cry, "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me."

ON A RANCH

Woman Found the Food that Fitted Her.

A newspaper woman went out to a Colorado ranch to rest and recuperate and her experience with the food problem is worth recounting.

"The woman at the ranch was pre-eminently the worst housekeeper I have ever known—poor soul, and poor me!

"I simply had to have food good and plenty of it, for I had broken down from overwork and was so weak I could not sit up over an hour at a time. I knew I could not get well unless I secured food I could easily digest and that would supply the greatest amount of nourishment.

"One day I obtained permission to go through the pantry and see what I could find. Among other things I came across a package of Grape-Nuts which I had heard of but never tried. I read the description on the package and became deeply interested, so then and there I got a saucer and some cream and tried the famous food.

"It tasted so delicious to me and seemed to freshen and strengthen me greatly so I stipulated that Grape-Nuts and cream be provided each day instead of other food, and I literally lived on Grape-Nuts and cream for two or three months.

"If you could have seen how fast I got well it would have pleased and surprised you. I am now perfectly well and strong again and know exactly how I got well, and that was on Grape-Nuts that furnished me a powerful food I could digest and make use of.

"It seems to me no brain worker can afford to overlook Grape-Nuts after my experience." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

As Seen From the Dome By F. D. Power

Our view this week will be limited. The diocese as seen from the Dome does not take in a vast scope of territory. It is important, however strategic, world-influencing and history-making in its position and work. The man in the Dome looked out upon it twenty-nine years ago and he saw very little, and was almost as lonely and discouraged by the outlook as Walter Scott when he climbed it and cast his eye over the prospect thirty-four years before. Now the scene has changed. Hives of workers are laboring here and there in the once destitute places. New centers of Christian influence are being opened constantly. Eight are in easy vision where two little struggling bands were then working, and beyond are ever increasing numbers as the diocese stretches away to the mountains of Maryland and the shores of the Atlantic.

Last week I had a visit to Washington county where the faithful Kendrick and Hoye are not holding the fort, but pushing the enemy. If ever there was a golden season for our cause in the east it is now. Sheridan telegraphed to Grant, "Things are in shape to push." The silent man wired laconically, "Push things!" The next offering is for general home missions, and that, too, ought to be a quarter of a million; not that we love heathen lands less, but we love our own land more. The Hagerstown and Beaver Creek Churches are as active as ever. H. C. Kendrick recently held a meeting with only home forces and added twenty-three to the number of the saved. The Hagerstown Church was never in better condition. One of the strong pillars of their work was H. S. Eavey, who recently fell asleep in Christ. He was a nobleman and a true Christian, and universally esteemed. Our colored brethren here are also prospering under the ministry of their excellent pastor, W. H. Dickerson.

Beaver Creek is the mother church and W. S. Hoye is the bishop of this region. Zack Sweeney says Christ did not give Peter "the primacy, but the priority." Our Beaver Creek pastor enjoys the priority and seniority among our Maryland preachers. For a score of years he has served the honored congregation on Beaver Creek and he is as busy holding protracted meetings as ever. He preaches once a month for Downsville, and in December added sixteen to the church there and greatly improved their house of worship. He has a half dozen other preaching points: Smo Ketsun, where he has forty members; Fairfield, Pa., a few miles from Gettysburg, and just across Mason and Dixon's line, where he recently held a meeting with J. A. Hopkins and added seven and effected an organization; Mapleville, and other places. No church pushes right and left the work of missions more than this country church which, in the twenty years of Hoye's ministry, has not only cared generously for its local work and erected a beautiful $14,000 house of worship, but has averaged besides $8,000 a year for twenty years in offerings for missionary, educational and benevolent work. Their new sanctuary is giving great satisfaction, and Uncle Billy Newcomer, Miss Ellie and the rest of the saints are enjoying it. It is a thing of beauty crowning the hill and smiling its benediction over all the fertile valley.

One great soul is missing here—our blind bishop, Alexander Newcomer; and yet not missing, for everything speaks of his presence and blameless life. It is just a year ago I wrote him to dedicate to some one some autobiographical notes for me, and he sent a Christmas turkey instead, and wrote later: "I am glad to learn that the proud bird of the mountain reached the national capital in safety and that he met with such kind greeting. I am also glad to know that international relations were not disturbed—Turkey met with no downfall, Greece was not overthrown, Africa was not humiliated, nor China destroyed." Referring to my request he adds: "You say you have some idea of writing me up or down, whichever I preferred. Excuse me if I say that I would prefer neither. If I wished a service of that kind done there isn't a man in the country I would prefer doing it to yourself, but I am trying to follow this motto: 'Do all the good you can, and say as little as possible about it.'"

'Any little corner, Lord
In Thy vineyard wide;
Where Thou bidst me work for Thee,
There I would abide.'

I enclose a piece of poetry containing my sentiments on this subject:

'It is not mine to run with eager feet
Along life's crowded way my Lord to meet,
It is not mine to pour the oil and wine,
Or bring the purple robe of linen fine;
It is not mine to break at His dear feet
The Alabaster box of ointment sweet:
It is not mine to walk through valleys dim,
Or climb far mountain heights alone with Him.
He hath no need of me in grand affairs
Where fields are lost or crowns won unawares.
Yet, Master, if I may make one pale flower Bloom brighter for Thy sake through one short hour,
If I, in harvest fields where stray ones reap,
May bind one golden sheaf for love to keep,
May speak one quiet word when all is still,
Helping some fainting heart to do Thy will;
Or sing one high, clear song, on which may soar
Some glad soul Heavenward, I ask no more.'

Not far away from Beaver Creek our indefatigable J. A. Hopkins labors in word and doctrine. His work is at Boonsboro, Md., and Waynesboro, Pa. Both of these were Beaver Creek Missions, as was Hagerstown. Two were recently added at Waynesboro. The church meets in a hall and has a membership of eighteen. It is one of the beautiful spots in the Cumberland Valley just across the line. Fifty-seven are in the Sunday-school. This is a new field. Recently Hopkins has been prospecting in York, Pa., and found nine "Scattered Disciples." York is an important city of 40,000, the former home of Judge and Mrs. J. S. Black. It was my privilege to preach there often during the life of Judge Black. Mrs. Black had her Bible class of thirty old women, and her chapel, and would get her candidates ready for baptism, and then send for a preacher to baptize them, but there never was a formal organization. It should be effected. J. R. Goff lives there.

Another point in the diocese recently visited is Baltimore. The work in our neighboring city has had some serious set-backs this winter. The fire has done mischief unspeakable, many of our brethren meeting with heavy losses. One of our preachers, W. R. D. Winters of Fulton Avenue, has been disabled by sickness. He is a beautiful character, and his ministry was being greatly blessed. It is a sad loss to our cause there. Our veterans, Abbott and Ainslie, have both suffered from illness in their families, the former being called to mourn the loss of his youngest boy, Richard, whom he dearly loved. Mrs. Abbott is also ill, as are Brother Ainslie's sister and mother. E. B. Bagby will begin a meeting for the Harlem Avenue Church March 13.

Our Washington churches are all happy. Ninth Street, where E. B. Bagby does such fine work, has had thirteen added the past month. J. Murray Taylor has held a meeting for four weeks past, resulting in thirty-two additions, making thirty-seven under his ministry since January 1st. He is fitting in admirably and growing in favor with all the people. Four of his recent additions were U. S. soldiers. W. L. Harris has baptized seven the last month. He is never content with a dry baptistry. Recently the Whitney Avenue Church, to which he ministers, has received a donation of 100,000 brick for their new Kimmell Hall, and it is going up. Claude C. Jones is doing excellent service at the new Thirty-Fourth Street Church and J. T. Watson at our Vienna Church where they will dedicate a new house of worship in May. J. Murray Taylor will undertake to open a mission in the ancient city of Alexandria, across the river, where we have about a score of members. The South East Mission is at work on plans for a six thousand dollar meeting house and will soon break ground. It is said of one of our preaching force: "Put him in Hades, and he will at once cast about to establish a mission." Vermont Avenue had five added recently, and on Sunday, 28, had the blessing of a sermon from Z. T. Sweeney. All looks well from the Dome.

Neglect of the Bible-School

By H. D. Williams

The church of to-day is guilty of glaring neglect of the Bible-school. Here and there are to be found exceptions to this statement, but in general it is true. The conspicuous indifference of the church to its supreme opportunity is manifest in many ways, but chiefly in the following four:

1. In Organization.

The average Bible-school is organized and managed in violation of all business and pedagogical principles. The school elects its own officers, the classes select their own teachers, and the pupils choose their own classes. What nonsense! How long would our public schools survive under such trifling? In the Bible-school it has done untold harm, and is still at it. Thousands of schools are to-day shorn of nearly all power for good by an inefficient management chosen and perpetuated by the school itself. Not many months ago a strong church in a growing western city was almost totally wrecked by the folly of its Bible-school electing its own officers.

But the chief harm done by the slipshod, unbusiness-like organization is in the impression it makes on the community, especially the younger portion of it. That impression is this, that while all secular institutions must have the advantage of the very latest and best methods of organization, the Bible-school does not need it, the Bible-school does not aim at anything definite and therefore does not need definite organization and method, the Bible-school deals with sentiment rather than with facts and therefore must not be slavish to rules and regulations, the Bible-school is not a very important institution but rather a useless but harmless religious conventionality neither to be opposed nor to be supported. With such an impression abroad in a community, the Bible-school is greatly handicapped.

2. In Support.

It is clearly the dictate of common sense that every member of the church should support, to the best of his ability, the Bible-school. They should be in full co-operation with either the regular or home department. The Bible-school ought to be in fact the church at work learning and teaching the Word of God, and every member should be an officer, a teacher or a pupil in a class. The day is not far distant when it will be so, and he who will not ally himself with the Bible-school enterprise which is the direct work of the church, will be considered unworthy the fellowship of a living church.

But behold the actual relation of the church to the Bible-school! From a careful survey of one hundred and forty churches, including country, village, town and city, only twenty to twenty-five per cent of the membership have anything to do with the Bi-bible-school except to send their children when convenient. This may be taken as representing the general attitude of the church. In the average family connected with the church, the children are urged gently to attend Bible-school. The decision as to whether they shall go or not, comes up, however, almost every Sunday. It is not understood that the Bible-school is on the Sunday program just as firmly as the dinner. Hence, under constant pressure to neglect, the Bible-school, the parents often yield for very trivial causes. Company comes, a visit is to be made, the weather is unpleasant, the head aches a little or the body is tired—these are the excuses for which the Bible-school is neglected. Is it any wonder that the children, especially the business-headed boys, come to look upon the school as a thing too insignificant for their concern? The meager support which the church gives to her Bible-school is cause for shame and deep concern for the future.

3. In Equipment.

An auditorium for preaching purposes is no fit place to hold a Bible-school if the school is to be anything more than a religious plaything. The teaching force of the church, as well as the preaching force, needs a building for its purposes. This has long been partially recognized by city churches. A few city churches have taken the advanced ground of a room for every class, and every room thoroughly furnished with maps, blackboards and a library. This is the ideal towards which every school should work. The inadequate equipment of the Bible-school is due, not to lack of money, but to a failure to properly appreciate and emphasize its work.

4. In Teachers.

In nearly every Bible-school in the land the cry is, "Teachers, teachers, more teachers and better teachers!" Is this not proof positive that the Bible-school occupies too small a place in the thought of the church? It is very difficult to find teachers who are willing to do the three very necessary things: Prepare the head, prepare the heart and be on duty. There are too few teachers who will be as loyal to their work as if they were being well paid in money. Not until the church thinks more of the Bible-school, and the preacher preaches more about it, and the elders pray more for it will there be more and better teachers.

From these evidences and many others it must be acknowledged that the church of to-day is sadly lacking in its valuation of the Bible-school opportunity. I believe, also, that our own people are more blameworthy in this respect than many others. Logically, we ought to be the foremost people in Bible-school work. But we have a large number of churches in cities, towns and country places where the Bible-school is nothing more than a dead conventionality. We also have a large number of country and village churches where the Bible-school is considered a worthless thing, and none is wanted.

It is gratifying to see that we are preparing to arouse our churches to a keener realization of their opportunities in the Bible-school. We now have a National Bible-School Board which was appointed at the Detroit Convention. This Board is preparing (see report of its recent meeting in St. Louis) to awaken our churches on the Bible-school subject and to help the Bible-schools to greater efficiency. Its work is needed. God speed it.

"DOETH GOOD."

And Addeth no Sorrow.

"I am an old lady and had used coffee all my life until a year ago then I found a drink 'that doeth good and addeth no sorrow.'

"For many years I had been troubled with constipation and stomach trouble, sleeplessness and various other ills and although I had been constantly treated I got almost no relief.

"I have always been a great worker with many cares and often in the morning I would feel unequal to my daily tasks. So I would drink a good stiff cup of coffee of which I was very fond and then for two or three hours afterwards I would feel so smart and buoyant and keyed up to such a high note that I could undertake most anything. But along about 11 o'clock the reaction would begin and leave me stranded on a lounge until dinner time. Then I would get a cup of tea to tide me over the afternoon. So it went on for a number of years and the great wonder is that I did not collapse altogether. I must have had a good constitution. Every month I got a little worse.

"At last and with great reluctance I was forced to the conclusion that it was coffee that was the chief cause of my many troubles. So I looked the matter up carefully, quit the coffee and began the use of delicious Postum; the wisdom of this change was soon shown in a material improvement in my health.

"Since I have been using Postum I do not have that unnatural elation and consequent reaction and the craving for the stimulant has left me. I am now strong and steady all of the time. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

News From Many Fields

Canton Notes.

Our attendance continues large. Brother Hicks has been called to preach for the church at Rutledge, Mo.

On last Friday evening a reception was tendered W. M. Jordan by the Quincy Church, at which our singing evangelist, Bro. Daniel Dungan, rendered several cornet solos, and was presented with a beautiful bouquet of pink carnations by the Christian Endeavor Society and the church.

The church at Marceline, Ill., for which E. M. Carr is preaching, will build an addition to their church.

F. M. Branick, an ex student of Canton, has been called to preach at Randall, Kan.

D. B. McCann has accepted a call to preach for the church at Philadelphia, in Marion county, Mo.

Daniel Dungan will sing for a meeting at Madison and Independence, Kan.; also for W. F. Richardson at Kansas City, Mo.

Prof. Youngblood, for many years the professor of logic, philosophy, psychology and Latin, died on the evening of March 28 at his home in Canton. Appropriate funeral services were held in the Christian Church, the sermon being delivered by D. Dungan. The remains were sent to Kokomo, Ind., for interment, being attended by Pres. Johann. In the death of Brother Youngblood the school has lost an able man, a faithful friend of higher education and a Christian whose work will continue to bear fruit among the hundreds of ministers—his former students—who fill pulpits in this and other states. Steps are now being taken to select his successor in the faculty.

Phoenix, Arizona.

So many inquiries concerning this region are constantly coming to me that I take this method of giving some information that will help to answer some of the questions that are put to me.

Phoenix is the capital of Arizona and is situated in the southern part of the territory, about midway between El Paso, Texas, and Los Angeles, Cal. It has a permanent population of about 7,000, and a transient or tourist population of more than that many more for eight or nine months of the year. It is in the midst of the great Salt River Valley, which is about 500,000 acres in extent. It is estimated that when the $3,000,000 storage reservoir, now under construction by the government, has been completed, there will be water sufficient to irrigate a little less than half of this entire area. This will include all that is now under irrigation. The adequately irrigated area will be about 200,000 acres.

These lands are extremely fertile and are adapted to the growth of all the citrus fruits and most of the cereals. With plenty of water and favorable seasons, seven crops of alfalfa can be grown in a single season. Arizona oranges command the highest prices on the New York market. Improved lands are worth from $50 to $125 per acre. Intelligent and industrious ranchers make money here.

There being so many invalids here, it is a good place for druggists, doctors and undertakers. Not being a manufacturing town, Phoenix does not offer strong inducements to skilled labor, nor indeed to labor of any kind. Good wages are paid to labor needed, but the demand is limited.

Phoenix has unusually good schools and churches. Strangely as it may sound to eastern ears, Phoenix is a church town. Every Sunday her churches are filled with cultured people capable of appreciating the best.

As to climate, taken all the year around, there is no place on the continent that can approach it. The summers are hot, but most healthful. Living is reasonable. Existence is a constant delight to him who has a modicum of health and wealth. W. H. BAGBY.

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

Our State Missionary Board met in Baltimore, Feb. 26.

J. Murray Taylor closed his meeting at H. St., Washington, Feb. 28, with 32 added, 20 of them baptisms. Whitney Avenue is building their Kimmel Memorial hall to accommodate the growing work.

The six persons who made the confession at Fairfield, Pa., as reported in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Feb. 25, were baptized at Beaver Creek, Md., Feb. 28. They took membership here until they are organized, and others by letter. They have $700 and some material subscribed for a new house of worship at Fairfield.

Our Sunday-school at Waynesboro has reached an enrollment of 60. We expect it to reach 100 or more in March.

Colorado Notes and News.

The Colorado Christian Herald is our state paper. A. E. Pierce is the editor. The paper is published in Denver. Leonard G. Thompson, the corresponding secretary of our state missions, is assistant editor. J. E. Pichett, pastor of the Highlands Christian Church, Denver, also lends a hand. We are proud of our state paper. A good meeting was held recently in the Highlands Church by S. M. Bernard, of Boulder. Between forty and fifty persons were added to the church. Brother Bernard has commenced a series of sermons in his own congregation, entitled, "A Journey Through the Bible." Boulder is the seat of the State University.

Frank O. Fannon recently spent a season in Fort Collins in evangelistic work. Thirty or forty persons became members of the church. W. J. Lockhart is the regular preacher. The church is in a prosperous condition. J. H. Mohorter came from the St. James Street Church, Boston, to the Central Christian Church in Pueblo. All goes well. Brother Mohorter assisted Clyde Darsie, of the Broadway Church, Pueblo, in a series of meetings recently, the immediate results of which were the addition of thirty or thirty-five persons to the membership of the church. The Broadway Church began five years ago as a mission; it is now self-supporting and is "at home" in its own building in a fine location. R. B. Preston began the work. He lives in Pueblo and preaches as he has opportunity in the region round about. Brother Darsie has done a work of which any man might be proud.

David C. Peters is pastor of the Christian Church in Trinidad. The membership of the church has almost doubled since he became pastor two years ago and the old debt has entirely disappeared. Brother Peters will leave about the first of March to make a journey through western Europe, Egypt, and the Holy Land. He expects to return about the first of July.

There were four baptisms in the Central Church, Denver. W. Bayard Craig, pastor, during the month; ditto South Broadway Church. The work at Golden is taking on new life under the ministry of J. W. Maddux. He and his wife are just the people for Golden. A number of persons have recently confessed Christ. The church at Windsor, of which S. K. White is pastor, is now practically free from debt. This church was organized in 1898. J. E. Pichett is now in a series of meetings in Windsor. Cripple Creek is a hard field. E. F. Harris has taken hold of the work there. He is a good man, a good preacher, a good pastor.

L. H. Humphreys, of Delta, Ia., has closed a successful meeting at Longmont. Thirty-two persons entered the fold. He is expected to become pastor of the flock about the first of March. The house of worship in Colorado Springs, where S. E. Brown preaches the word, is crowded every Lord's day and there are frequent additions. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions has done a good work in Colorado. There are 44 congregations of the Christian Church in the state. Only eleven have not received assistance from the Christian Woman's Board. From the beginning to the present time this board has invested about $30,000 in Colorado. The Disciples in this state believe in the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

The following churches have observed C. W. B. M. day: The Central, South Broadway, Highlands, East Side and Berkeley, where Mrs. F. D. Pettit preaches, in Denver, the Broadway Church (Pueblo), Greeley, Longmont, Fort Collins, Boulder, Florence, Grand Junction, Wray, Golden, Colorado Springs and Loveland. The state normal school is located at Greeley. The Disciples organized in Greeley less than a year ago. L. E. Scott is their preacher. The work is growing. Brother Scott baptized four persons, in the country, a few miles from Greeley, not long since. There are twenty-five or thirty unaffiliated Disciples at Littleton, ten miles south of Denver. It is only a question of time when there will be a congregation of the Christian Church in Littleton.

Good News from the Field.

Our work at Indiana, Pa., was a success in every way; but the crowning work of the three weeks' meeting was the addition of S. M. Work to the working force of the church. He is a business man of town and a very active Christian worker, who has for years been convinced of the evils of sectarianism and the beauty of Christian union. Brother Work, says the pastor, E. Lee Perry, has for a long time been teaching the Bible class in the Presbyterian Church, conducting a private Bible class on each Monday night, and preaching at some school house on Sunday nights, and he has been teaching the same things for which the Christian Church has been contending for years. On Tuesday evening of last week, Brother Work brought seven converts, the fruit of his own labor, with him. In accord with his desire, and with full consent of the congregation, he was publicly and solemnly set apart as an evangelist. He then entered at once upon his duties and baptized the seven candidates which he had brought.

At Columbus, Ind., the home church, the pastor, H. H. Harman, Brother Luceney and the writer had the pleasure of receiving Bro. Richard S. Martin into the fellowship of the church. Brother Martin comes with a splendid record from the M. E. Church, where he has preached for the past sixteen years. He has a fine presence, voice and mind. He is going through a meeting with us at Lake Charles, and he is proving himself to be a veritable Moody in evangelistic work. I first met him in our meeting at Danville, Ill. He heard a three weeks' series of doctrinal addresses there which gave him a new conception of how Christians are made according to New Testament pattern, and he was moved largely to take the step through the light received in that meeting. When this meeting is over, he will be ready for active work, and it will not be hard to find him plenty to do. His family is in entire sympathy with him. They are all consecrated workers and splendid musicians. His son Elbert was baptized into Christ at the Tabernacle in Columbus, the same day that his father was received into the fellowship of the church. His wife and three daughters compose the rest of the family. His eldest daughter Edna is a young woman of more than ordinary ability as a soloist. She and her father would make a strong team in the evangelistic field. Already he has several call for meetings, but Mrs. Martin prefers a pastorate. His home is at 349 McLean Avenue, Chicago.

W. S. Buchanan is the pastor here. The church is proud of him and they have good grounds. He is full of zeal, consecrated from the sole of his feet to the crown of his head, scholarly and a winner of souls of the first water. We have been in a meeting for a week with immense audiences and good prospects. S. M. Martin, of St. Louis, held a fine meeting here last year.

A. R. Davis, of Dimond, O., is the soloist and leader of song. He is doing grand work. The most complimentary thing any man can say of Brother Davis is this: He is a thorough man of God. JAMES SMALL.

Michigan.

G. A. Gish visited Benton Harbor recently, and the prospects are favorable for his locating at that place.

G. Carl has accepted a call to the churches at Hartford and Millburg, and is already in charge.

E. E. Mack, of Ft. Wayne, Ind., has accepted a call to Algonac.

C. J. Tanner is in a meeting at Detroit, Central, with J. Walter Wilson as singer.

J. S. Raum is in a fine meeting at Saginaw with 51 additions to date.

W. H. Kindred is in a meeting with the new church at Battle Creek, with 39 additions the first week.

There were four additions in a short meeting held recently at St. Johns, where D. Munro ministers, W. H. Kindred doing the preaching.

W. B. Taylor's meeting at Ionia resulted in 72 additions, with bright prospects for the future.

L. O. Drew is in a meeting at Lacota.

F. T. Porter is seeking to adjust difficulties at Buchanan.

Arthur Holmes has been called to the pastorate of the church at Ann Arbor.

The third district convention will be held with the church at Belding, April 5-7. A good program has been prepared and a large attendance is expected.

The writer will close his work at Cascade April 24. This church will then need a good preacher. C. M. KEENE.

February Report for Kentucky Missions.

W. F. Rogers was at work full time, preached ten sermons and reports fair progress.

D. G. Combs in eastern Kentucky reports 16 days, 21 sermons, 19 added, one officer appointed, one prayer-meeting organized, $10 for self.

H. C. Runyon was at Latonia all the month, preached eight sermons, made 37 visits, $13.85 for self, $104.75 for local work.

W. D. Darnell reports for six months at Bellevue, Boone county: 19 sermons, 19 added, 50 visits, $80 for self. He is now in Alabama.

A. K. Brooks preached one Sunday at Jackson, and Brother Harris preached one Sunday in his stead.

H. J. Derthick reports full time at Berea, 18 sermons, 13 added by confession and baptism and eight otherwise. About 50 added since the first of the year. He is doing a great work.

L. B. Haskins gives a good account of the work at Erlanger. He was there two Sundays.

Wm. Gross reports for December and January 12 days, 15 sermons, six added, $3 for self, $9 for local work in southeastern Kentucky.

R. A. Hovious was in Russell county 19 days, preached 22 sermons, aided two places, 23 added, congregation inaugurated at Russell Springs, house secured for regular preaching. In a meeting at Jamestown, Russell county, at the time of report.

J. K. Osborn was in Harlan county 12 days, preached 12 sermons, added three, 14 visits, $16 for self.

Jas. E. Thomas was at Beattyville only one Sunday, on account of smallpox scare.

D. C. McCallum is preaching for the Irvine Church two Sundays in each month. He thinks the outlook favorable.

A. T. Felix is giving all his time to Bardstown and Springfield, and the work goes on very well.

A number of men did not report in time for publication with this. We urge all the workers to send in their reports promptly on Monday before the first Saturday in each month.

H. W. Elliott gave full time to the work and collected $236.03. This is nearly $100 less than the collections of the same month in 1903. We urge all who have any money in hand for state missions to send it in at an early date. Enough money has been raised and not forwarded yet to meet our expenses for the next two months. We plead with the brethren to send it in without waiting for another letter. H. W. ELLIOTT, Sec.

Dedication at Evanston, Ill.

Lord's day, Feb. 28, was a day of great triumph and rejoicing for the Evanston Church. This church was organized eight years ago, and has been worshipping in rented halls until within the past month. Last August a vacant lot in the central part of town was purchased and paid for. Plans were at once drawn and preparations made to build a $5,000 chapel this winter. Pledges to the amount of nearly $2,000 were secured from the membership. But before the time for beginning the active work of building arrived, another circumstance arose, which can be accounted for in no other way except to say that it was God's leading. About eight years ago, the First Congregational Church started a mission in the southwest part of town. For many reasons the venture proved a failure, both financially and otherwise. In December, 1903, they became very anxious to sell the whole outfit. It represents a cost of between $6,000 and $7,000. They offered to sell it to the Christian Church for $3,000. It was purchased January 1 and $1,000 paid. Interior improvements were at once made in the form of redecorating, carpet and pews, at a cost of about $600. The carpet was put in by the G. E. Society, and the indebtedness assumed by them, and the pews were furnished by the ladies' aid society.

Bro. L. L. Carpenter was present and conducted the services in the morning and afternoon on the day mentioned. Bro. Carpenter is a master of such occasions. About $2,000 was needed to provide for all indebtedness. Taking into account the small membership, only about a hundred, and the sacrifices they have made during the past six months, very few dared hope that the full amount could be raised. But the members set the example of generous, cheerful giving, and others, strangers as well as friends, caught the enthusiasm, and before the close of the afternoon service it was announced that the entire amount had been provided for in cash and pledges running over a period of nine months. The church was then formally dedicated to the worship of God, and after the dedicatory prayer all joined with a hearty good will in the singing of "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." The building is of composition material, or cement, on the outside. It is not large, but splendidly arranged, with a seating capacity of over 300.

W. D. WARD, pastor.

Evanston, Ill., March 1, 1904.

Results in India.

Wednesday, Feb. 3, was a great day in Harda. We had 15 baptisms on that date, the largest number we have had there at one time since my coming into India. Four of these came from Handia, where our evangelist, M. J. Shah, is stationed, two from Timarni, where S. P. Isaac carries on both medical and evangelistic work, one or two from Rahet Gaon, where Yakub Masih is located, two from the leper asylum, just outside of Harda, and the rest were of Harda proper. Only one of them was of a Christian family, so that this number represents that much gained directly from heathenism.

A large crowd of natives gathered to witness the ceremony of baptism, which was performed in the river near the town. But there was perfect order throughout it all, and it certainly must have impressed them, the more especially as there were several prayers and short talks in which the meaning of baptism and the duties of Christians were set forth.

Such incidents as this are the things which go to encourage us. We sow the seed day by day, and it sometimes appears that the harvest never will come, but in his own good time God gives us the fruit. The work is moving along favorably at the other stations, though Mrs. Rambo is compelled to return to America on account of ill-health. She expects to leave with her children on March 22.

JESU S FEEDS THE FIVE THOUSAND.—
—Matt. 14:13-23.

Memory Verses 20-21.

GOLDEN TEXT:—Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life.—John 6:35.
The Return of the Twelve.

The twelve apostles, it will be remembered, have been making their first experimental attempts at an independent ministry, while Jesus has been making a short tour by Himself. (Matt. 11:1). It is while the Twelve are away, that the disciples of John the Baptist come and report his death at the hands of Herod. Shortly afterward, the apostles return to Jesus "and told Him all things whatsoever they had done and whatsoever they had taught" (Mark 6:30). What an interesting reunion that must have been! What experiences there were to recount of preaching and healing, of victories over disease and sin, and perhaps of some failures where in their inexperience they had gone wrong. Certainly there must have been much to talk about when the Twelve came together to report to their Master the results of their first work in His name.

The Call to Rest.

Jesus saw that His disciples were weary with the work they had been doing. They needed rest from the work and from the excitement, and freedom from the crowds which have been thronging about them. And so, recognizing that the welfare of the workers is essential to the prosperity of the work, He called them aside for rest and recuperation (Mark 6:31). There are times when the call to recreation is as divine as the call to service and more important and pressing. There are times when a vacation is the truest vocation.

The Eager Multitude.

But the multitude would not permit them to escape even when they took a boat and went to a quiet place on another shore of the lake. Going around by land, the crowd overtook them. Even the sick and crippled were carried along. When Jesus and His apostles landed, there was the crowd. As He had had compassion on the disciples and called them to rest, so now He had compassion on the people and would not send them away disappointed. But He did not lay upon His tired disciples the work of healing. He did it Himself. Not only did He heal their diseases, but He "spoke to them of the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:11), for bodily healing had always a spiritual significance with Him and was made the vehicle for teaching religious truth. So great was the eagerness of the throng to hear and to be healed that the flight of time was unnoticed and the recurrence of the most pressing needs found them unprepared. Even at evening the people apparently did not notice their perilous condition until the disciples called attention to it. Jesus certainly did not mean to encourage people to ignore ordinary precautions for supplying their physical needs, but some recognition was due to those who, on this occasion, had been so thoroughly absorbed in the words and works of Jesus that they had forgotten even their hunger.

The Multiplied Loaves.

The Twelve demurred mildly at the suggestion that they should furnish food for this vast multitude. Jesus did not stop to argue away their objections, but claimed their assistance and convinced them by the results. It is characteristic of His method and of the principle that holds good in Christian service to-day, that He did not create food from nothing, but multiplied the small quantity which was at hand. God's way of working is to add His blessing to our inadequate human resources and thus make them adequate, rather than to do the work without man's help. So now the great crowd was seated, the five loaves and two fishes were brought out and broken and given to the apostles, and then in the very act of distributing to the hungry people the supply was multiplied until it became more than sufficient for all needs. It is in the very act and moment of service that the divine increment comes to make our slender resources adequate to the great tasks that confront us.

Why Feed the Hungry?

Jesus did not usually do by miracle what men could do for themselves by ordinary means. His healing was usually of incurable cases, such as demoniacs and paralytics, whom ordinary doctors could not benefit. In this case, however, it seemed desirable to show special consideration to people who had so far forgotten themselves in hearing the word and in bringing their friends to be cured. Perhaps he also thought it desirable by this miracle of loaves and fishes to sanctify the common things of life. Perhaps he wished to show that God's hand is to be seen in the supply of our normal wants as well as in the provision for unusual needs such as the casting out of demons. There are some nowadays who are unduly anxious that the church shall not become a soup-kitchen, and who interpret every ministry to man's physical needs as implying neglect of the spiritual. Jesus felt no such anxiety. He was willing to give men what they needed, be it food for the body or food for the soul. It is not improbable that a large proportion of these five thousand were farmers, at least they knew the process of the seasons and of the growing grain. If so, doubtless the next time they reaped their harvests, a hundred-fold more than the seed they had sown, they thought of this wonderful episode of the loaves and fishes and knew that he who had multiplied the bread to that hungry throng was exercising the same power which multiplies the seed in the harvest.

The End of a Period.

This event, followed closely by the return across the lake, in the course of which Jesus walked upon the water, and by the discourse upon the bread of life (John 6:22-71), closes the second period of the Galilean ministry. Jesus now retires into the north with his disciples and henceforth devotes himself almost exclusively to the training of the Twelve.

So Easy to Forget

In 999 cases out of every thousand, the directions which accompany a physician's prescription or proprietary medicine, tell you to take a dose three or four times a day, either before or after meals, and on going to bed. In 999 cases out of a thousand, this rule is never strictly followed. You start in to observe it religiously, and succeed pretty well at first, but soon you'll begin to skip doses, then the medicine fails in its intended effect. It's so easy to forget.

If the remedy is liquid form, the business man loses a dose in the middle of the day unless some thoughtful wife, mother or sister gives him a spoon and makes him take an extra bottle to the office. Most men hate to do this. If the medicine is in tablet form, the chances are he will never think of it until he reaches for car fare on his way home. It's so easy to forget. This applies to men and women alike.

The proprietors of Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine) had sense and foresight enough to make their remedy so that only one dose a day is necessary. It is easy to remember to take it after the last meal or on going to bed. It stands in a class by itself. If you are pestered with indigestion, constipation, liver trouble, bowel trouble or any skin affliction resulting from bad blood, Vernal Palmettona is what you need. Try it at our expense. Write for a free sample bottle. It will do you good. Address Vernal Remedy Co., 506 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y. Sold at all drug-gists.

LITTLE THINGS THAT CHRIST MAKES GREAT.

1 Cor. 1:25-29.

For the Leader.

We come to-night to study the little things out of which the Master will help us to make up the great things of our lives. It is not always the showy, the easily seen, the noisy, the thing that attracts the multitude, that is of the greatest importance. The quiet, the retiring, the seldom seen, the unostentatious, the little and apparently unimportant thing is often the far-reaching and important one. The big things of life are aggregations. They are not simple, but compound. They are really made up of many little things. The little things hold the key to their existence. The man of scholarship—his ability—it is made up of perseverance, sacrifices, hard study, close application, economizing of time; and the result of these which we call his scholarship is not one thing, one attainment, but an understanding of the many things which make up an education. Without attention to the little the larger could not be. So in the Christian life; that which we admire and that which is the end of Christian effort here, the full Christian character, is made up of the many littles of Christian effort.

For the Members.

1. As recorded in Matthew 14:16-21, Jesus took the very little food to be found in the great crowd of hungry hearers and made out of it enough for the thousands. Even his miracles of this class do not make from nothing, but begin with what is in hand and build the bounty of blessing out of it.

2. Again, this lesson of using what we have with a view to increasing it to the proportions of the great things we want is taught in the Parable of the Talents as recorded in the 25th of Matthew. Each was given a basis upon which to begin. From that he was expected to work in proportion to what he started with.

3. From history we get the same lessons of the little things making the great men. They have, almost without exception, been men of what one might call small beginnings. There are Lincoln and Garfield, fresh in the memories of all. The sacrifices of the youth will forever move us to sympathy, and the heroism with which they met them, looking after the details of life, will ever challenge our admiration. They took care of the small things, and as it is in all the ways of God in both the natural and the spiritual, the large things took care of themselves.

4. Spare moments are little things. Many waste them because they place no value at all upon them. Yet men have educated themselves out of the opportunities of spare moments. Many of us who say, "We can not do any church work; we can not find time to do anything for the Master worthy of attention; the Lord will have to excuse us; when we get time we will make up for it," forget that we have the time and the opportunity every day to do great things for Christ. The fault with such is not an unwillingness to be of service to the Lord, but in the failure to grasp the importance of the little things of time, the spare moments. We are looking for some great thing to do.

Do we not remember what Jesus says of the reward of one who gives even a cup of cold water to one of the prophets of the Lord?

Quiet Hour Thought.

Let us think of all the little things that come in our way every day we live for Christ, and then let us begin anew to appreciate what He can and will make of these for us.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting.

March 16, 1904.

THE GOSPEL OF LUKE.— Luke 1:1-4.

Of the many narratives written concerning Christ, in the years immediately following His personal ministry, four only have come down to us. It is probable that these four accounts of Jesus have survived because they were regarded as the most authentic records of the wonderful life with which they deal.

1. "The beloved physician." The author of the Third Gospel, which takes its name, like the others, from its author, was not a Jew, as most of the Bible writers were, nor was he an apostle. He was a physician, a gentile, probably a native of Antioch, and among the Grecians who were turned to the Lord in that city, after the persecution which scattered the disciples from Jerusalem (Acts 11:19-21). He was a traveling companion of Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, in his later missionary labors. He shared Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea, went with him to Rome, and stood by him faithfully there in his sufferings. His style shows him to have been a man of education well-fitted for such a literary task, and his companionship with Paul would give him additional qualification for his work.

2. Sources of information. Luke's gospel appears to differ from the others in its sources. Matthew probably wrote as an eyewitness, supplementing his information, it may be, from Mark, if that be the older gospel. Mark wrote largely, perhaps from the recollections of Peter, who would be excellent authority for the facts in the life of Jesus. John, the last of the four writers, being a disciple and chosen apostle of Jesus, would draw from his own memory the deeds and words of his Master. But Luke seems to have gained access to all the available sources of information in his time, and, comparing narrative with narrative, and consulting such living witnesses as he could, wrote an orderly and accurate narrative of those things which were deemed indisputable in the circle of believers.

3. Characteristics of Luke's Gospel. It is generally held that Matthew wrote for the Jews, Mark for the Romans or Italians, Luke for the Grecians, and John for the Asiatics in general, and to correct certain errors that had already crept into the church. The common aim of all of them was to answer the question, "Was Jesus of Nazareth the Christ of prophecy and the Son of God?" But Luke's Gospel possesses certain characteristics which differentiate it from the others, among which may be mentioned the following:

a. It is not enough for Luke to trace the genealogy of Jesus to David, or to Abraham; he carries the line back to Adam, "who was the Son of God." Jesus must be made to appear as the Son of Man, and related to the whole race, and hence a Savior for all men, Gentiles as well as Jews. The citation by Luke of the Syrian leper and the wisdom of Serepta, as instances of God's mercy to Gentiles, in Jesus' sermon at Nazareth, had the same object in view.

b. Luke also emphasizes what may be called the humanitarian side of Christ's work—His compassion for men and His power to heal them. The "Good Samaritan" is an instance of the kind of teaching by Jesus which Luke loved to emphasize. The parable of the Prodigal Son is peculiar to Luke and falls in with his characteristic view of God's character as revealed in Christ. Many similar passages might be cited and it will be exceedingly helpful to read this Gospel with this thought in view. The leader might call for other parables, miracles or incidents recorded by Luke, which make up this feature of his Gospel.

c. It is characteristic of Luke to mention the fact of Jesus praying in connection with many important events in His life. He mentions the fact that Jesus was praying when His disciples asked Him to teach them to pray (Luke 11:1, 2); that He spent a whole night in prayer prior to His calling His apos-

ARE YOUR KIDNEYS WEAK?

Thousands of Men and Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

To Prove What the Great Kidney Remedy, Swamp-Root, Will Do for YOU, Every Reader of the Christian-Evangelist May Have a Sample Bottle sent Absolutely Free by Mail.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work.

Therefore, when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the great kidney remedy Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys begin to get better they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

I cheerfully recommend and endorse the Great Remedy, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, for kidney trouble and bad liver. I have used it and derived great benefit from it. I believe it has cured me entirely of kidney and liver trouble, from which I suffered terribly.

Most gratefully yours,
A. R. Reynolds, Chief of Police,
Columbus, Ga.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for many kinds of diseases, and if permitted to continue much suffering and fatal results are sure to follow. Kidney trouble irritates the nerves, makes you dizzy, restless, sleepless and irritable. Makes you pass water often during the day and obliges you to get up many times during the night. Unhealthy kidneys cause rheumatism, gravel, catarrh of the bladder, pain or dull ache in the back, joints and muscles; makes your head ache and back ache, cause indigestion, stomach and liver trouble, you get a sallow, yellow complexion, make you feel as though you had heart trouble; you may have plenty of ambition, but no strength; get weak and waste away.

The cure for these troubles is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the world-famous new kidney remedy. In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect helper and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

How to Find Out

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy for kidney, liver and bladder troubles.

SPECIAL NOTE.—So successful is Swamp-Root in promptly curing even the most distressing cases of kidney, liver or bladder troubles, that to prove its wonderful merits you may have a sample bottle and a book of valuable information both sent absolutely free by mail. The book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured. The value and success of Swamp-Root is so well known that our readers are advised to send for a sample bottle. In sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., be sure to say you read this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The Proprietors of this paper guarantee the genuineness of this offer.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root—Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

bles (Luke 6:12, 13); that Jesus was praying when He was transfigured (Luke 9:28, 29); that the Holy Spirit is given in answer to prayer (Luke 11:13).

d. Finally, the fullest and most beautiful account of the birth of Jesus is given by Luke, emphasizing His humanity; and his record of the incident connected with the resurrection of Jesus is unexcelled in the graphic and convincing character of his testimony.

Prayer: We thank Thee, our Father, for this beautiful picture of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, given us by Thy Servant, that we might believe on Him to the saving of our souls. Help us to study this life with fresh interest and to strive to make our lives like His. For His name's sake. Amen.

—The Arkansas State Convention will be held at Little Rock, Ark., May 6-9. The cause is looking up in that state, and this convention should mark a point of departure for even larger things.

—Casper C. Garrigues, of Philadelphia, preached three Sunday afternoons in February at the railroad Y. M. C. A. at Reading. His themes were "Influence," "Back to Christ," and "The Glory of Evangelism."

—The Evanston, Ill., Christian Church, in connection with its dedication, issued a pamphlet giving in concise form "The Who, What and Why of the Christian Church." The statement was prepared by the pastor, W. D. Ward.

—Good news comes from Laoag, province of Luzon, P. I. W. H. Hanna writes under date of Jan. 11 as follows: "First fruits of Ilokanos. Last night 11 were baptized, and there are four others who have confessed. The entering wedge is formed. Spread the good news."

—If any church failed to take an offering for foreign missions last Sunday for any reason, it is hoped the matter will be attended to next Lord's day. An offering from every church and a gift from every member should be urged.

—The church at Dresden, Kan., expects to dedicate its new building April 10. Any one who wishes to help this little band of half a dozen Disciples who are trying to clear the building of debt, may do so by sending contributions to Chas. Hoppas.

—The church at Steubenville, O., took their March offering Feb. 28, amounting to $280, with more to follow. This is more than $100 increase over last year. This church, together with the churches in the county, will rank themselves with the living links this year.

—Rev. Henry Otis Dwight has been elected Corresponding Secretary of the Bureau of Missions. This is an interdenominational organization which maintains a bureau of information covering all fields and phases of missionary work. Dr. Dwight was for thirty-four years a missionary in Turkey under the A. B. C. F. M. (Congregational) and has written books and articles which have won him a high reputation in and out of missionary circles. He will attend to any inquiries respecting foreign missionary enterprises. ## ELGIN WATCH the business man's timekeeper

Every Elgin Watch is fully guaranteed. All jewelers have Elgin Watches, "Timemakers and Timekeepers," an illustrated history of the watch, sent free upon request to ELGIN NATIONAL WATCH CO., ELGIN, ILL.

—Let it be remembered that the whole month of March is set apart for the churches to gather their offerings for world-wide missions. Some country churches will take their offerings later than the first Sunday. Every church should strive to make its offering generous.

—T. P. Winter, pastor at Greenwich, Ohio, writes that the church at that place held a successful missionary rally Sunday evening, Feb. 28. Addresses were made by several of the members and by the pastor. The church expects to exceed its apportionment for foreign missions.

—Mary E. Tufts, of Missouri, has just given our National Benevolent Association $500 on the Annuity Plan. This is the second sum given by Sister Tufts for the benefit of the hundreds depending on this association. Write Geo. L. Snively, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, for information concerning annuities.

—Since the dedication of the new church at Miller, S. Dak., by J. W. Hillon, of Bethany, Neb., the work at the former place has been prospering. The pastor, A. O. Swartwood, held a two weeks' meeting which revived and strengthened the church. At present the public schools are closed and all church services suspended on account of an epidemic of diphtheria.

—The church at Jacksonville, Fla., is making a special effort to raise $3,000 to complete its building. This congregation has done a wonderful piece of work in erecting its building after the fire, and we have not the least doubt that, under the leadership of the pastor, J. T. Boone, and C. W. Zaring, and other consecrated men, they will succeed in this enterprise.

—D. W. Moore celebrated the sixth anniversary of the beginning of his pastorate with the South Street Church, Springfield, Mo., on Feb. 28. The past year has been the best. There were 105 baptisms and 61 added to the church otherwise during the year. $5,200 was raised and expended and over $700 was given to missions. The church has bought a lot and will erect a more adequate building in the near future. Bro. Moore called at this office last week on his way to New York where he will sail with the Sunday-school convention party for a visit to Jerusalem and a tour of Palestine and Europe.

—We deeply regret to learn of the death of Prof. A. J. Youngblood of Christian University, Canton, Mo. He died at Canton, Saturday evening, Feb. 27, at the age of 61 years. His body was sent to Kokomo, Ind., for burial. He was among the strongest friends and supporters of Christian University and his loss will be deeply felt. Dr. D. R. Duncan writes: "He was well and favorably known among our people as one of our best teachers. He was a strong teacher and was loved by all his students. It will be hard to fill his place, especially in the hearts of the students. They were all incited to a noble life by his teaching and example."

—The Lebanon (Ind.) Daily Reporter devotes three pages of a recent issue to a fully illustrated report of the dedication of the new Christian Church at that place. $16,000 had already been raised, and on dedication day, with the assistance of F. M. Rains, $13,000 additional was subscribed which will provide for all indebtedness. A. J. Frank is pastor of this splendid congregation.

—W. S. Swinney says: "The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is day by day growing in strength, favor and influence. The first thing I read is 'The Editor's Easy Chair,' next the Washington letter, then 'Current Events.' I usually get my paper on Saturday and the high plane upon which it is written and the Christ-like spirit which permeates every page help me to the best for Sunday's work."

—Madison Hart, pastor of the Fulton, Mo., church, is spending a few weeks with his father in Kentucky. He will return by the first week in April and will be ready to welcome all comers to the Missouri Lectureship which meets at Fulton, April 11-14. Bro. Hart is just recovering from an attack of typhoid fever. Pres. J. B. Jones of William Woods College, which is located at Fulton, writes that Bro. Hart's ministry in that place is being greatly blessed.

—The Main Street Christian Church, Kokomo, Ind., was completely destroyed by fire at an early hour Saturday morning, Feb. 27. The fire originated from an overheated furnace and had spread so far before it was discovered that it could not be checked. The buildings and furnishings were very conservatively valued at $40,000. There was only $5,000 insurance on the building and $3,000 on the pipe organ, a splendid instrument which was installed only about a year ago. The pastor, J. H. MacNeill, has done and is doing a splendid work in this strong congregation and, while the loss of the building is a very serious blow to the work, it can be safely predicted that the congregation will quickly rally and carry on the work. Arrangements have been made for holding the regular Sunday services, including the Sunday school, in the City Hall.

—E. F. Randall writes: "The First Church of Christ, Tonawanda, N. Y., gave to their pastor, Edward F. Randall, and family, a very cordial and hearty welcome in a well-planned and well attended reception in the church on Thursday evening, March 3. Many of the brethren from North Tonawanda, together with the pastors of the two churches in that city, Bro. W. C. Hull and Bro. W. C. Bowers, graced the occasion by their presence and words of welcome. Bro. R. H. Miller, pastor of the Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, was also present with his good wife, and added to the felicities of the evening with his words of wit and wisdom. Pastors of other churches in this part of the city were also present to give their words of welcome. Altogether it was a very enjoyable and successfully conducted affair. We enter upon our work here with no doubt of our welcome, or of the loyal support of the church which is so necessary to the success of a pastor's work. With God's blessing added, we shall look for rich fruitage from this field of labor."

—J. S. Hughes, of Chicago and Macatawa, Mich., is still making a specialty of holding what he calls St. John Institutes for churches, conventions or assemblies for Bible study. Brother Hughes has given more special study to the writings of the Apostle John than any one among us, so far as we know, and is constantly opening new mines of thought in that profoundest of New Testament writers. Gen. Garfield once said that the Church had had its Petrine period, and later its Pauline period, but that it was just entering upon its Johannine period. He did not imply in this statement that the writings of Peter and Paul would ever cease to be of authority and value, but that the type of thought represented by the "beloved disciple" was to be dominant. Brother Hughes believes this and has prepared himself by long study to hold institutes in which the historic setting, outline and analysis and special characteristics are presented in a most convincing way. He ought to be kept busy in delivering his lectures on this subject and awakening interest in Bible study.

A Victory for Purity.

The victory for civic righteousness in Los Angeles is a note of encouragement amid the strife in which many cities are taking part. A statement of the unique methods by which it was obtained may be of interest to your readers.

As differing from other reforms, the movement in Los Angeles was in no sense political. It was not gained at the polls; nor can it ever be overthrown by a defeat at the polls. The administration under which this reform was accomplished was elected before there had been any moral agitation. Consequently it is as representative of the corrupt elements of society as any administration to which the city is ever likely to submit.

The movement was religious from start to finish. The initial literature was addressed to the Christian public and was distributed in the churches. Earnest workers attended prayer meetings and fellowship meetings and prayed and testified against the shame of the city. Parlor meetings were held at which twenty or thirty persons discussed the situation and then went to their knees until their souls were on fire. Crusade parties of women went down and pleaded with their fallen sisters. Crusade parties of men went down and reasoned with the male patrons. It was a movement of Christian people led by their pastors.

The abolition of the "crib district" was made a Christian duty. A holy war was preached both in pulpit and press. The sad case of their outcast sisters was laid upon the hearts of the people. This was done with unsparring persistency, growing in magnitude, for a year. Finally the people were led forth en masse in a mammoth demonstration against the district that had been abandoned to vice. This was done on such a scale that it was called by the press "the most remarkable religious crusade in modern times." The effect upon the authorities was startling. And now, months after, the diligence of the police in pursuing the work of purification shows how completely the moral atmosphere has been changed.

The fact that this victory was won by a method of campaign, hitherto but little tried, has led us to consider it a sign of hope to other cities. So we have tendered to the Christian public the suggestion that this method be generally adopted; and that so far as possible our cities unite their efforts in a national campaign. A general correspondence with purity workers has led us to believe that the time is ripe for action in many places. For the best results it is necessary for our cities to act together. To secure unity of counsel and a plan of concerted action we have suggested a national convention in St.

Louis, some time before the close of the World's Fair. This proposition has been widely circulated and is favourably received. The advance literature has been mailed to six hundred religious, temperance and purity publications and to several thousand prominent workers.

If our present sporadic and spasmodic efforts can be merged into a federal movement, with a simultaneous action, a national leadership, and a religious enthusiasm, it will speedily appear that we have opened a new chapter in the history of our struggle with the Social Evil.

SIDNEY C. KENDALL.

Chairman of the Purity Committee of the Los Angeles Ministerial Union.

Helps to Faith.

The Cumberland Presbyterian, in a review of J. H. Garrison's latest book, says:

This is called "a contribution to theological reconstruction." The author is the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of St. Louis. He recognizes that Christian thought is going through a transition period, and his book is written to help those who may otherwise be carried away into unbelief. He rightly views the condition of things as hopeful, and believes that this age is the most religious of all ages. His work is divided into two parts. The first treats of the facts on which faith rests, and the second gives some supposed obstacles, with the purpose of removing them. The treatment of the various topics in the first part is interesting. Beginning with man's instinctive religious nature, he proceeds to discuss the fact of sin, the revelation of God to man, especially in Jesus Christ, the masterful grace of God in making the revelation real, the meaning of Christ's death, the Holy Spirit and other common truths. In most of these he is sane and helpful. In the second part, he discusses the obstacles to faith in a similar strain. Only two or three times does the author show his peculiarities of belief. In the chapters, "What Must We Believe?" and "A Divided Church," he goes somewhat aside to express himself as to those who do not hold to his way of thinking. But aside from these blemishes the book is to be commended.]

The Christ in Modern English Literature.

The Pacific Christian says of George H. Combs' recent book:

This book comes to us in very handsome dress. The author is our own George H., one of Kansas City's popular pastors. The title commends itself as a good one. It almost seems easy. A few hours' work with paste-pot and shears, and the work is done; and about as valuable as the prize list of last year's county fair. But the book in hand is not of this character. Here is a man with a knowledge of modern English literature almost encyclopedic, with the rare critical faculties of judgment, discrimination, insight and fairness, together with a well-ordered brain. The result is a work that for literary quality and critical acumen, as well as breadth of vision and richness of material adduced stands out conspicuously in the literature of our people. Nowhere has the author shown better judgment than in the assorting of his material. He groups it under titles like this: "The Literature of Silence," meaning thereby such men as Burns and Scott, whose writings betray the Christian spirit, yet carry no word about the Christ, "Voices of Rebellion," Byron and Shelley, etc., "Il Penseroso," the pessimist, "The Poets of Paganism," and so on. The reviewer regrets his inability to do justice to this book, and commends it to readers of all classes as a work of fascinating interest, rich in material for the thinker, the preacher or essayist, or the general student.

Dedication at San Bernardino, California.

Sunday, Feb. 28, was a good day in the history of the Disciples of Christ at San Bernardino. On that day they dedicated to the Most High their new church home—their new house of work and worship. The building is a thing of beauty, one of the prettiest things in church architecture on the Pacific Coast. There were three elaborate services. In the morning A. C. Smither, of Los Angeles, preached a most impressive sermon on "Christ's Love for the Church." In the afternoon the Lord's Supper was observed in all of its touching tenderness. After this sacred scene, the pastors of the city took part in extending congratulations and good wishes to the pastor of the Christian Church and his people. In the evening Brother Dowling, of Pasadena, delivered his great sermon on "What the Christian Church Stands For." Altogether it was an exalted day—a day on which God was well pleased—well pleased because of the high order of worship, well pleased because of the sacrificial gifts of his people; they gave until they felt it—some gave at every service. O how glorious is this blessed giving! As Brother Holden, pastor of the Congregational Church here, said, "You people have a great church, because your God is great."

Brother Smither is a great church dedicatory; he did his work in a heroic way—he came, he appealed, he conquered; when he comes money must come. He raised enough money in cash and pledges to provide for all indebtedness.
J. R. SPIE, Minister.

Arkansas Missions.

While somewhat late, perhaps the following record of the last quarter of 1903 may be of interest.

The report of work done the last quarter of 1903, with results as nearly as they can be told in figures, is as follows:

Days' work, 917; sermons, 362; baptisms, 88; other accessions, 99; total, 187; churches organized, four; Sunday-schools organized, two; Christian Endeavor Societies, one. The new congregations are all building. For building, pastor's salaries and state missions, not pledged, the corresponding secretary has raised during the quarter, $2,325.45. The above work was done by brethren working under the auspices of the State Mission Board. Other excellent work has been done by men with self-supporting congregations, but the above figures are given that the reader may see the advantage of co-operative work. Please study them. None of the points where above work was done would have had it without help of missionary co-operation. The state evangelist or corresponding secretary preached during the quarter, 83 sermons, baptized 19, had 48 other additions. These facts are mentioned because we have heard intimations that the work of the corresponding secretary is unnecessary, a waste of time, etc. There are now five houses of worship building in the state under the auspices of co-operation. The work above noted cost for the quarter, of mission money, $568, and was done by twelve persons, with the help of two short meetings in which evangelists from abroad, not paid anything by mission boards, assisted. The aggregate in these, of additions to the churches, was twenty-seven. The other preaching was done by the brethren, partly supported by mission funds. This work cost in mission funds (amount used to supplement the salaries paid at mission points), $3.13 for each addition, and an average of $47.33 for each man engaged. Is there any better investment that can be made? We certainly ought to be vigilant, discreet, prudent and use the Lord's bounties to best advantage.

ing for a meeting, the former with Brother Updyke, the latter with him or some other successful evangelist.

The writer recently held a meeting at Springdale. I have hope for their future success. Members are moving in and Brother Trundle, the pastor, is well spoken of. T. D. Stanley is enthusing the members of the church at Van Buren with the spirit of work and devotion.

Newport is at present without a preacher. They can pay the right man about $600. It is a good field, an important point.

Our state meeting will continue over Sunday, beginning on Thursday evening before the first Sunday in May. We look for a good attendance and an excellent meeting.

The church at DeQueen will, we trust, ere long be in their new house.

E. C. BROWNING.

The Missionary Rallies.

During January and February rallies were held almost daily, in the interest of foreign missions. From New York to Des Moines, and from Chicago to Lexington, earnest men and women met in convention to consider how best to advance the kingdom of God in the world. Most of these meetings were presided over by A. McLean, the veteran leader of our missionary hosts. G. L. Wharton, of India, and the writer accompanied him. We have noted the following:

1 The general principle is a good one. The rally is an educator. It is a stimulator. It is an opportunity. It is a preparation and a promise. The rally concentrates thought and feeling, and then disseminates them as seeds for future nobler and finer action.

2 The character of the rallies was of a high order. Scores of addresses were made which were worthy of a national convention. The various phases of the theme, "World-Wide Missions," were ably treated by hundreds of preachers who rejoiced to prepare for these occasions. Each gave of his best. Musicians lent their assistance, and a gracious hospitality everywhere abounded.

3 The spirit of the meeting was that of quiet, earnest consecration. An abiding thought, often expressed, was, "this is God's work." Brother McLean's opening devotional exercises lifted the meetings to a high plane of spirituality, which was maintained. The need of more prayer was emphasized in each convention, and many heart-searching prayers were offered up. Some addresses lifted us to lofty regions of spiritual vision. Churches were moved to become living links. Hundreds were strengthened for a higher service, and some young people offered for the foreign field.

4 The attendance was most encouraging. In places where rallies were held last year, the attendance this year was about double that of last year. And although week days were used, in many places the churches were full. It is evident that the people want the rallies and that tens of thousands can be reached by this means each year.

The signal success of this long series of meetings indicates that the rally is to be an important factor in bringing the churches up to the measure of the "greater things" so earnestly desired by all. The Disciples of Christ are evidently on the threshold of a day of "greater things."
W. P. BENTLEY.

Interesting to Americans.

Western Canada Will Soon Become the Supply Depot for Wheat for Great Britain.

During the past year about 50,000 Americans went from the United States to Canada. Most of these settled upon farm lands, and the writer is informed by agents of the Canadian Government that the greatest success has followed the efforts of nearly all. To their friends on this side of the boundary line the fullest assurance is given of the prosperity that is in store for them. There will always be a splendid market for all the grain, cattle and other produce that can be raised in Western Canada, and with the advantages offered of a free homestead of 160 acres of land, and other lands which may be bought cheaply, an excellent climate, splendid school system, educational advantages of the best, what more is required. The husbandman gets more return for money than in any other country in the world.

On the occasion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's visit to the Corn Exchange, London, Eng., Colonel Montgomery, V. D., made several important statements. "The function (he said) which you have just been assisting in connection with a kindred association has doubtless shown you the importance of the provision trade of Liverpool in its relationship with the Dominion, and the enormous possibilities of the future development of that trade. Well, the grain trade of Liverpool has interests with Canada no less important than those of the provision trade. When it is borne in mind that 80 per cent of the breadstuffs of this great country has to be brought from abroad, you will readily appreciate with what great satisfaction we view the large and steadily increasing supplies of grain which are annually available for export from Canada, and I challenge contradiction when I say that of the wheats we import from Russia, India, the Pacific and the length and breadth of the United States, none gives more general satisfaction, none is more generally appreciated than that raised in the Province of Manitoba. We can not get enough of it, and it is no exaggeration to say that there are before us now dozens of millers who hunger for it. This is not the time to enter into statistical questions, but we look forward with confidence to the time at which, with the present rate of progress, the Dominion of Canada will have a sufficient surplus of wheat to render this country independent of other sources of supply. I think I may, with justifiable pride, remind you that this is the chief grain market of the British Empire, and through its excellent geographical position, as well as through the enterprise of its millers, it is now the second milling centre in the world."

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad in connection with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad operates a through buffet drawing room sleeping car daily between St. Louis and Jacksonville, via Montgomery, Alabama. This car leaves from the Union Station, St. Louis, at 8:45 P. M., arriving at Montgomery next evening at 7:45 P. M., and Jacksonville the second morning at 8:30 A. ## An Antidote for Skepticism.

This great book, "Helps to Faith," from the pen of Dr. J. H. Garrison, is a most timely work adopted to a wide class of readers. It should be read by all our preachers, for it faces present-day problems: and by all intelligent persons, for the things of which it speaks are in the air.

The author has aimed not to say too much, and yet he has gone to the heart of the matter in each chapter. The lucid diction and clear-cut statement causes each chapter to stand forth as a gem. It is easily carried in the mind and pondered.

The fact of man's religious nature, which the author makes his basal argument, is one which science has in several ways helped to bring into new prominence in recent times, and it is peculiarly convincing and satisfying to those who have felt the influence of scientific modes of thought. It carries also far-reaching implications which are instantly felt without being drawn out in argument. It goes far toward capturing the whole field. It lacks the far-off-ness of some of the older arguments—which are, nevertheless, still valid—and comes home to every man with "Thou art the man." It makes religion a part of manhood. I would advise preachers to study this argument in its many sidedness, for it has many sides, and carries in its very statement a kind of self evidence.

These chapters abound in not only what may be called direct evidences, but in a class of evidence that may be called indirect. The man of all my acquaintance in the last generation who converted the largest proportion of men, especially skeptical men, seldom preached directly on the evidences, but his sermons were filled throughout with discovered correspondences, fitnesses, and marks of wisdom inwrought in the plan of salvation. Every sermon stood forth like a temple resplendent with the divine glory. Skeptics who had been unmoved by the usual arguments have told me that the gospel as unfolded by that man was too wonderful to be less than divine, and have bowed to its claims.

There is much of this kind of evidence in this book. The sweet reasonableness, naturalness, and beauty of the gospel everywhere appear.

There is another thing characteristic of this book that may most fitly be referred to as a contagiousness of faith. Intellectual assent doubtless depends mainly on evidence, but strong, vital trust is vastly helped by spiritual quickening. "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief," was not a call for more evidence, but a cry of weakness. It is much to be in company with a man or writer who has a calm, assured faith. Such men quicken us. Christ's words have this quality in a wonderful degree; so much so, that they are said to be "spirit and life." The fires of martyrdom have often kindled a veritable conflagration of faith. So of all men of faith; they are unconsciously strength-givers. A book may be to the reader a very bath of conviction. We meet this quality everywhere in this book. Every chapter leaves the reader with a calm optimism and a feeling that all is well. The author does not struggle or cry aloud; the faith is too assured for that. It is poised at a serene height where there is peace. Look in the words for this quality, and it may not be easy to find it, but the gentle spell is there. Even "cold type" is wonderfully telltale.

There is one recommendation which I would make with special emphasis. This book should go into every Christian family, and be placed within easy reach of the young. It is very common to find families in which both parents and the daughters are members of the church, but the sons are not. Ask the parents why this is so and they cannot tell. Certain of the seeds of skepticism have found lodgment in the minds of these young men, and are forever holding them from Christ. I groped for a book like this in my teens and found it not, and for lack of it nearly went overboard right in a Christian home. These seeds of skepticism are in the air, in the society of young men. When thought wakes up there can be only doubt where there is no material for conviction. Starved to death might be written of many a poor boy gone forever. The brighter the boy the greater the danger. We disinfect our homes against contagious diseases. Put this book in your home and guard against poisons no less deadly. Young men will read it. It is plain, brief, and to the point, and it may be all the world to them.

Then, no Christian is either strong or safe without being able to give a reason for the faith that is within him. He should not only read, but make thoroughly his own every fact and argument contained in this book. Its size and manner of presentation make this easily possible. Dr. Garrison is to be thanked for giving this most useful work to the brotherhood.

A Home Cure for Cancer.

Thousands of dollars have been spent and years of labor exerted to discover the cause and perfect a cure for that terrible disease, Cancer. Success has attended the efforts so far of but one concern, the Dr. D. M. Bye Co. One single bestowal of a million dollars upon the cause of Home Missions alone would multiply results fifty times within a year, and set in operation forces that would multiply in limitless progression throughout the years.

The disciples number 1,280,841 members (conservatively estimated). We ought to average one dollar per member for permeating our own land with the gospel. Last year we averaged 8 cents.

There are records from 10,935 churches. Last year we received offerings from but 2,060 churches.

Irish Home Rule measure. And now he has in much the same way brought about the disruption of that political conglomerate called the Unionist Party, by springing a stupendous fiscal controversy on the astonished country. He has miscalculated his power. He has disgusted the ablest men amongst his colleagues, such as the duke of Devonshire, Lord Goschen, the Hon. Mr. Ritchie, an ex-chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Winston Churchill. These will not agree to the taxation of the food of the people. And it is only now that Parliament has met, that the serious nature of the split is understood. Mr. Balfour is ill. In a few hours from the time when these lines are being written Mr. Joseph Chamberlain will be sailing for Egypt for a holiday, which he is taking just at the very moment when he might be supposed to be most needed by his party. Thus we seem to be without a government as well as without any leaders. And this state of political insolvency happens at a moment when the outlook in the whole world is unspeakably disquieting. The expected war in the far east has commenced, and Britain is allied to one of the combatants, at least in certain contingencies. Thoughtful people are profoundly apprehensive as they regard the possibilities of the near future. They see that those possibilities may involve America as well as England in the fury of a storm such as never before in history burst upon the nations of the earth. And yet I have heard some people make light of the idea that any conflict like that now begun was at all probable. So, as the complications thicken—as they almost inevitably will—the easy prophets will predict smooth things. The far eastern imbroglio will change the face of the world, and will bring judgment on the great powers for their cruel and iniquitous policy in regard first to Armenia and then to Macedonia. I make this statement because I believe in a righteous God who will by no means pass over such iniquity, even though proud, selfish and self-righteous nations are the guilty parties. We in Europe know well that when the snows begin to melt on the Balkans, and when the warm scented breath of the spring blows over the valleys of the Perim Dag and the rose gardens of Kezanlik, then will the Macedonians, with Bulgaria, Serbia and Montenegro at their back, fly once more to arms, defiantly refusing to wait the crafty and cowardly pleasure of these callous governments which have disgraced the very name of Christian civilization, by pretentious pandering to the bloodthirsty tyrant of the Bosphorus. These topics are included in my letter because they are of prime current importance, and because the world is about to resound with a series of appalling thunderclaps.

Jottings.

I have received several urgent requests to write more for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I will do so, if the editors see fit to publish my articles.

Since my home has been in Iowa and Minnesota, I have had editorial connection with the Christian Union and Evangelistic Review. The latter was recently swallowed up by the Christian Companion. Now that Missouri is to be my home again, I shall bestow more labor upon the papers of that state.

Joplin, Mo., is to be our home, and we are shipping our goods to that city this week. Address me there.

My son, Dr. M. R. Ely, will also locate in Joplin for the practice of his profession.

My time is all engaged for meetings until next year. We are now in a series of meetings in Virginia, Illinois. We are in the second week and have four conversions to date.

J. W. Carpenter is the godly and talented preacher for the Virginia Church, and association with him is a perpetual joy. Brother Carpenter is a poet of unusual talent and a writer of popular songs. He has prepared the Easter exercise for the Benevolent Association, and his songs will be sung by thousands of young people. Brother Carpenter is on his second year with this church. He is doing excellent work.

The Virginia Church paid its last debt recently, and it is the first time in many years that it has been free from debt. The church house is very large and elegant in all its arrangement. Among the membership this church has as choice spirits as can be found anywhere. Sister Savage, so widely known in the brotherhood, is one of God's own. The Carpenters, Wilsons, Blacks, Savages, Martins, Turners, Robinsons, Hendersons—these and many others are devoted and efficient.

This is the home of Adah Torrey Henderson whose beautiful poems often grace the columns of our papers.

To-day is the thirty-third anniversary of my wedding day. Tempus fugit!

J. J. Lockhart, of Nevada, Mo., is challenged to meet a Cumberland Presbyterian in debate, and the event is set for the first week in August.

C. E. Brother, superintendent of the city schools at Billings, Mont., has been gathering together the hitherto scattered Disciples in that city, and forty persons have expressed a willingness to organize a congregation there. This is good news. Brother Brother was superintendent of the city schools in Kirksville, Mo., several years.

Our scattered brethren should get together in every community and keep house for the Lord. Do not dissipate your powers, but use them for the glory of the Lord.

The Sangamon Presbytery is now in session in this city. The Presbyterian women have the use of our church for their sessions.

Charles Martin, a lawyer, is superintendent of the Sunday-school and leader of the choir. He is a fine soloist as well as choir leader. Charles Savage looks after the finances of the church. Charles is a lucky name here! Virginia, Ill. SIMPSON ELY.

Professor Sniff's Article.

The article in the last CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on "More Preachers Needed," by Prof. L. M. Sniff, seems to me to be just the word for the hour. Professor Sniff's long and very successful experience as a teacher, entitles him to a very careful and thoughtful reading. Brethren, if you have not read his article or have read it but once, hunt it up and read it now.

I do not know Professor Sniff, but I do know his influence. From the beginning of my ministry twenty years ago until now, I have been running onto his students here and there, and they have universally pointed to Professor Sniff, not only as a fine teacher, but as the one who, above all others, gave them higher ideals and nobler aims in life. We can not afford to ignore the counsel of such a man. I consider the most important statement in his article to be this in substance: "We need preparatory schools to draw young men from the farms and to give them an opportunity at self-discovery."

I know at least a dozen young men on farms, who can not be drawn by our present colleges and universities, but could be drawn by a good academy course. Once in the school and under the influence of consecrated teachers, they might discover themselves as future preachers of the Word.

Our people in Missouri have a fine chance to support and develop such a school at Canton. For some time this school has been patronized almost solely by young men and women from the country, and who are securing an education by a hard struggle. The spirit of sacrifice and devotion to the cause of Christ, pervades the entire school, and is so intense that no student can escape its influence. Over half the young men that went there have been going into the ministry. Their intellectual growth enabled them to know their own powers, and the spiritual impression of the school impelled them to the ministry. Can we afford to lose such a school? The school is now in financial distress. Its new building is up but unfinished, and the future looks dark.

Let the Missouri brethren take hold of Canton, make it a thorough English and preparatory school with expenses at the lowest point, give it enterprising management, and it will draw five hundred young men and women from the country places of the state.

The present management of the school has done and is still doing wonderfully well, considering the obstacles to be overcome. I never have known a body of teachers more devoted to their mission or holding students with a firmer grip. The faculty, especially Professors Johann, Dungan and Youngblood, deserve all praise.

But something should be done, and I believe Professor Sniff's article points out our opportunity.

Plan for Home Bible Study.

Last November I became simultaneously impressed with the fact that the Holy Spirit was a much neglected doctrine and the Bible a much neglected book, and so began to cast about for the connecting link. On the one hand, we needed information about the Holy Spirit; on the other, a daily searching of the Scriptures. The plan to read the New Testament through, noting all the passages on the Holy Spirit, was the result. The plan was simply to get as many as possible to read two chapters daily, keeping alert for all information on the Holy Spirit. The course of study commenced Dec. 3, 1903, and will end April 10. I prepared a weekly lesson calendar, so that each member of the class could know at any time where he should be reading.

The plan also included the mid-week prayer-meeting. We purposely began the study on Thursday so that by the next Wednesday night we had read fourteen chapters. We then took up each Wednesday at prayer-meeting all the passages on the Holy Spirit found in the previous week's reading, led by the pastor, with free discussion from all present. An additional prayer-meeting feature was the selection of four prominent sections from the New Testament, one for each Wednesday in the month. These were the Beatitudes, Matthew 7, Romans 12, and 1 Corinthians 13. These we memorize and repeat in concert, one of them at prayer-meeting every Wednesday night. The first Wednesday in each month we repeat the Beatitudes; the others follow in their order.

I had the entire plan printed upon a neat card about ten inches long by three and one-half inches wide, the card to be used as a Bible book-mark and reminder. At the bottom was attached a perforated enrollment card to be signed and returned to the pastor. On the Sunday before the class began I preached a sermon on the importance of Bible study in the home, explained our plan of work and distributed the book-marks. The class began with about one hundred signed members and has grown some since. I think that most of those who signed have kept up with the class, and there seems to be a general interest in the work. The prayer-meetings have grown in both attendance and interest beyond anything we have had before in my three years' work here. The people are beginning to realize that there is a Holy Spirit and that he is promised to Christians.

For several weeks I have been preaching a series of Sunday morning sermons on the Holy Spirit, and shall continue the series indefinitely. The people generally seem interested in the subject, and the attendance at these special services has been unusually good. Under the guidance of the Spirit things have recently taken a very practical turn, and we seem likely to soon be rid of some of the evils in the church and in the town. I take it as an indication that the consciences of church members are being aroused to the sense of the duties and obligations of Spirit-filled Christians.

Have found the following books helpful in the study of the Holy Spirit, which I would arrange as to merit thus: "The Ministry of the Spirit," A. J. Gordon; "Through the Eternal Spirit," J. Elder Cumming; "After Pentecost, What?" J. M. Campbell; "The Spirit of God," G. Campbell Morgan; "Spirit and Life," A. H. Bradford; "The Indwelling Christ," J. M. Campbell.

Bright's Disease

Caused the death of Doctor Bright. Bright's Disease is simply slow congestion of the Kidneys. In the last stage the congestion becomes acute and the victim lives a few hours or a few days, but is past saving. This insidious Kidney trouble is caused by sluggish, torpid, congested liver and slow, constipated bowels, whereby the kidneys are involved and ruined.

Drake's Palmetto Wine is a foe to congestion of Liver, Kidneys and tissues. It promptly relieves the congestion and carries it out of the Liver, Kidneys, tissues and blood. Drake's Palmetto Wine restores the mucous membranes to healthy condition, relieves the membranes throughout the body from inflammation and cures Catarrh, Constipation and Liver and Kidney disease to stay cured. It gives relief immediately, builds up vigor and health, prolongs life and makes it enjoyable. A trial bottle always gives relief and often cures. A trial bottle will be sent to every reader of this paper who will write for it to Drake Formula Company, Drake Building, Chicago, Ill. A postal card will bring this wonderful tonic Palmetto medicine to you absolutely free. It is a boon to disease-laden, pain-ridden men and women.

A REMEDY FOR Epileptic Fits

Out of deep sympathy for our readers who are afflicted with epilepsy, we wish to give the following information:

Our son suffered from this dreadful disease from childhood and had the attacks daily, and often as high as eight and ten times a day. All medicines and doctors were of no use—his case was considered hopeless. The more medicine he used the worse he became. Somewhat over two years ago we heard of a doctor who had, after thirty years of hard study, found a cure. As hopeless as our case was, we decided to try this doctor. One of our ministers from there wrote us that he was personally acquainted with the doctor, and knew of the most incurable cases, some of which were of thirty and forty years' standing, which had received help, and had been enabled to enjoy good health thereafter. We put our boy under treatment, and at once were aware of a change for the better. The first five weeks he had but one spell a week, then followed weeks in which he had none; the last two spells which he had occurred two years ago, and otherwise his health is bettered. Thanks to God! Any further information will be cheerfully given to anyone who may inquire.

Harrison, O.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Mar. 7.—Great audiences here yesterday, three additions, church exceeded apportionment for foreign missions. Boone is a power in the church and city. Great outlook.—JAS. SMALL.

MCMECHEN, W. Va., Mar. 6.—The Clarence Mitchell meetings continue; crowded houses; 205 additions to date. The largest meetings ever held in this city and the greatest meetings ever held in West Virginia by the Disciples of Christ.—J. W. UNDERWOOD, pastor.

ARKANSAS.—Fayetteville, Mar. 1.—There were two conversions at the First Church on last Sunday.—N. M. RAGLAND.

CALIFORNIA.—Red Bluff, Feb. 29.—R. L. McHatton, of Santa Rosa, Cal., was with us in a short meeting which closed last night. Eighteen were added to the church, 15 by baptism and three by letter. Brother McHatton is a good speaker, and loves the gospel and men with an intensity that is not often equalled. I was never in a meeting where as little was said about money. We have a large, elegantly equipped church here, and this meeting has put us in shape to swing this beautiful city into line. We have here the making of one of the greatest churches on the Pacific Coast.—D. A. RUSSELL.

Los Angeles.—At the close of E. S. Connor's two years' pastorate in Pomona, Cal., the church gave him and his family a farewell reception, and presented him with a gold watch with an engraving of the church building on the inside of the case. The church also gave Mrs. Connor a gold watch, and their daughter Lola was presented a beautiful ring. During the two years there were 90 additions and over $1,000 for missions.—E. S. C.

Vacaville.—Our church work is prospering. I have had a new experience lately. For the first time in my life I have had opportunity to participate in a union meeting on equal terms. Four churches united in this meeting, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Christian. No outside help was called, the pastors preached in turn. Each church had its usual Sunday morning services, but all the other meetings were union. No conditions were imposed and each seemed willing to adopt whatever was best in the methods of others. There was no anxious seats. Converts came forward during the singing and made confession of their faith, as in our own meetings. All could agree on this confession. There were no attempt to settle the question as to the exact moment that forgiveness was obtained. I took the confessions of converts to other churches and they took the confessions of ours indiscriminately. There were 16 conversions. Of these at least nine will be members with us. I have already baptized five and expect to baptize next Lord's day. One pleasing feature of the meeting was that the pastors went out two by two and visited every home in town distributing invitations and offering prayer wherever it was agreeable. In almost every instance consent was given, even Catholics welcoming religious services in their homes. This method of pastoral visitation has been so agreeable to all the pastors that it will be continued in the regular work. The moral effect on the community of seeing all the churches working together was great, and some of the preachers expressed the wish that such union efforts might be continued permanently. This meeting suggests a way that other communities, having preachers that are reasonably flexible, may have a revival with little expense and without preaching the life out of any one man.—J. E. DENTON.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Washington, D. C., Feb. 29.—The writer has just closed a four weeks' meeting with the H. Street Christian Church of this city, resulting in 32 acces-

It's surprising how quickly children respond to Scott's Emulsion. It contains just the element of nourishment their little bodies need. They thrive on it.

Even a few drops in the baby's bottle have a noticeable effect for good. Nothing better than Scott's Emulsion for growing children.

sions, 20 baptisms, the remainder being from the denominations and by letter. The weather was miserable all the time, still we always had a large audience—often overflowing our building. We have plenty to do and are happy. At our regular semi-monthly meeting of the ministerial association this morning, 19 additions were reported. We of the capital city are on the "firing line."—J. MURRAY TAYLOR, Sec. Washington Ministerial Association.

ILLINOIS.—Charleston, Feb. 29.—Meeting here still continues; 108 added to date. Brother Allen Wilson is rousing up the town.—W. H. HARDING.

Thomson, Feb. 29.—One baptism last Friday night.—CECIL C. CARPENTER.

Alvin, March 1.—Closed meeting at Bismarck quite a while ago, with nine additions, four confessions, three from denominations and two by letter. Church was greatly encouraged and I now have reorganization under good headway. Two added at Alvin from denominations since my last report. Work prosperous. Good prayer-meeting and Christian Endeavor at each place.—C. F. GAUMER.

Charleston, Feb. 29.—Eighteen yesterday, 108 to date. Allen Wilson gave us great sermons and had great audiences yesterday. Six hundred women heard him on "A Woman's Power." Nine came forward at that service. Meeting continues.—WILL F. SHAW.

Watska, Feb. 29.—Two additions by letter yesterday; more to follow. Will take offering for foreign missions next Sunday. We hope to reach or exceed our apportionment, which is more than the church has ever given before, but we must meet it in order to reach the quarter of a million this year.—DAVID J. ELSEA, pastor.

Loami, Mar. 2.—I baptized a bright young school-teacher here Tuesday, Mar. 1. Nine added since last report.—J. W. LARIMORE.

Mt. Sterling, Mar. 3.—Our meeting here has been in progress one week. Six additions to date. Expect to continue one week longer.—H. A. NORTHCUTT, evangelist, N. E. CARY, pastor.

Mt. Sterling.—We are having a good meeting here. Bro. N. A. Northcutt, of Kirksville, Mo., began a meeting with the church here last Thursday evening. No additions so far but crowded house and good interest.—WM. M. GREENWELL.

Champaign, Mar. 3.—We closed a meeting here at the University Place Church last night of five weeks' duration, and with 102 added. Of these very many were men and women; among them were 13 husbands and their wives. The church is materially strengthened, and the foundation has been laid for a large future work through the simple straightforward preaching of the gospel plan for saving men. Bro. J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, did the preaching and did it well. He leaves us with no bad effects of the meeting to be "lived down," and the community in which we live and labor has a new conception of "The Gospel which is God's Power to Save." There have been 170 added here since July 1.—STEPHEN E. FISHER, pastor.

Carbondale, Mar. 4.—Ninety-six additions in our meeting here so far. I am open for engagement as soloist and leader of song for April. Permanent address, Bethany, Neb.—CHARLES E. McVAY.

INDIANA.—New Albany.—Three accessions at Park Church last Sunday; one by statement, two by confession and baptism.—WM. A. WARD.

Noblesville, March 4.—Have just closed a meeting with home forces. Prof. Willard did excellent work as a soloist. His illustrated songs are very effective. There were 75 additions—59 confessions, 16 by letter or statement.—E. B. BARNES.

Marion, March 2.—Five baptized into Christ at First Church.—E. L. FRAZIER.

Butler, Feb. 29.—Meeting closed here last evening with six confessions, one reinstated. One confession last evening of the meeting, one confession at the water on Monday after the meeting had closed. I go to Edon, O., today to begin a meeting to-night with Brother Bauer, who is the regular pastor. We have not neglected the March offering. Plans have been laid, and we are carrying them out.—D. F. HARRIS.

Terre Haute, Feb. 29.—We had very good audiences yesterday at the Central Church. One confession in the morning. A special class is forming for the study of the life of Christ. Leonard Barbre, pastor of the Second Church of this city, is confined to his bed with measles. Bro. C. C. Fidler filled his pulpit yesterday. The College Avenue Christian Church, recently organized by Bro. T. J. Legg, has its regular meetings. The Central Church has installed the individual communion.—A. L. WARD.

Columbus, March 4.—I have resigned as pastor of the Central Christian Church of this city to accept a call from the Christian church, Everett, Washington. The call came to me through Bro. A. L. Crim, of Ladoga, and the national organization of the C. W. B. M., who has the work there in charge. I go the first of April. Since coming to the Central Church one year and six months ago, there have been more than 100 additions to the membership of the church. A more kindly feeling between the two Christian churches now exists, and some indebtedness has been paid. It is necessary that the church have at once some sweet-spirited man to continue the work.—O. W. MCGAUGHEY.

Oaktown, March 4.—Meeting here seventeen days old; 33 added. Eugene T. Martin is the evangelist. Great preaching; chorus choir of 100 voices. Packed house every night.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON AND WIFE, singers.

INDIAN TERRITORY.—Tishomingo, March 3.—A few days' meeting at my regular appointment at Roff last Lord's day resulted in four additions by letter and, I think, increased interest in the work.—E. S. ALLHANDS.

Bristow, March 2.—Am here in a meeting with very encouraging outlook. Have had 15 additions the first week. Large audiences every night and the people of the town seem anxious to hear our plea, which is comparatively new in this country. John R. Oury, of Murray, Ky., is the leader of song.—F. HOOKER GROOM.

IOWA.—Cedar Rapids, Feb. 29.—Three more additions to the Second Church here yesterday. This makes 11 since you last heard from us. The outlook is more encouraging to me than it has been since I took the work here. We can see the triumph from afar, and we hope by faith and work to bring it nigh.—J. E. DINGER, pastor.

Keota, March 1.—Had six confessions here Sunday—four young men and two young la-

Cincinnati, March 1.—Feb. 22 we observed the thirteenth anniversary of the organization of the church. At the evening service Bro. D. A. Wickizer delivered a splendid address. We gave an invitation and three responded, making the good confession. The interest was such that we decided to continue the meeting a few evenings. Brother Wickizer has been with us eight days and there have been 38 additions—17 women and girls, 21 men and boys; 24 by confession and baptism, four reclaimed, three from the Baptists, one from the Methodists, and six by relation. Morning, March 2.—Four added last night, three by confession, one by statement; 42 in nine days.—W. H. COLEMAN, pastor.

My permanent address is Comanche, Tex.—ARTHUR W. JONES.

MISSOURI.—Tarkio.—We have located Bro. C. G. Brelas as pastor. He is taking hold of the work in good shape. He has organized a special Bible study for each Friday evening which is very interesting. We had one addition last Lord's Day. The church bought a good parsonage last year, value $2,000.00. We are sure the work will prosper under such a leader as Bro. Brelas.—H. W. HURST.

Grant City, Feb. 29.—One confession and baptism yesterday.—J. A. MCKENZIE.

Meadville, Feb. 29.—Two additions to the church yesterday. We have some faithful disciples here and the outlook is much better for a good church than formerly. I have been making occasional visits here for the last three months, but must go at once to my work at Shawnee, O. T. This church and Wheeling could use a good man to advantage.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

St. Joseph, Feb. 29.—We closed, last night, a four weeks' meeting at the First Church here, under the leadership of O. W. Lawrence, of Rock Island, Ill., with 74 additions to the church. Twenty-three were new. It was a model meeting in every respect. We now have more than a thousand members.—C. M. CHILTON.

Picking, March 4.—Three baptized last night making 34 additions since coming here last November. Eighteen came in during the Conner and Butler meeting, 14 by baptism and four by statement. The outlook is good for the future.—M. L. COTTRELL.

They began Feb. 21st; expect to continue three weeks. He is speaking to crowded houses. The people hear him gladly. The Auditorium and Sunday-school rooms are both filled and chairs in the aisles. Four additions so far, one by confession. He is truly "a fisher of men." He goes where they are.—C. KEITH.

Weston, March 3.—On account of protracted illness of my wife I did not begin my work here Jan. 1, as was intended. Have been here two weeks. The work starts off nicely. Walter Wilson conducted the music, closed on Feb. 12, with 40 additions; 28 of these were adults and 32 by baptism. Brother Myers is at liberty to hold a month's meeting. Any church desiring a good meeting will do well to negotiate with him. Brother Wilson's stereopticon lectures on "The Life of Christ," "In His Steps" and "Ben Hur" were splendid and are wholesome for any community. ## WHAT SULPHUR DOES

For the Human Body in Health and Disease.

The mention of sulphur will recall to many of us the early days when our mothers and grandmothers gave us our daily dose of sulphur and molasses every spring and fall.

It was the universal spring and fall "blood purifier," tonic and cure-all, and mind you, this old-fashioned remedy was not without merit.

The idea was good, but the remedy was crude and unpalatable, and a large quantity had to be taken to get any effect.

Nowadays we get all the beneficial effects of sulphur in a palatable, concentrated form, so that a single grain is far more effective than a tablespoonful of the crude sulphur.

In recent years, research and experiment have proven that the best sulphur for medicinal use is that obtained from Calcium (Calcium Sulphide) and sold in drug stores under the name of Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They are small chocolate coated pellets and contain the active medicinal principle of sulphur in a highly concentrated, effective form.

Few people are aware of the value of this form of sulphur in restoring and maintaining bodily vigor and health: sulphur acts directly on the liver, the excretory organs and purifies and enriches the blood by the prompt elimination of waste material.

Our grandmothers knew this when they dosed us with sulphur and molasses every spring and fall, but the crudity and impurity of ordinary flowers of sulphur were often worse than the disease, and cannot compare with the modern concentrated preparations of sulphur, of which Stuart's Calcium Wafers is undoubtedly the best and most widely used.

They are the natural antidote for liver and kidney troubles, and cure constipation and purify the blood in a way that often surprises patient and physician alike.

Dr. R. M. Wilkins while experimenting with sulphur remedies soon found that the sulphur from Calcium was superior to any other form. He says: "For liver, kidney and blood troubles, especially when resulting from constipation or malaria, I have been surprised at the results obtained from Stuart's Calcium Wafers. In patients suffering from boils and pimples and even deep seated carbuncles, I have repeatedly seen them dry up and disappear in four or five days, leaving the skin clear and smooth. Although Stuart's Calcium Wafers is a proprietary article, and sold by druggists, and for that reason tabooed by many physicians, yet I know of nothing so safe and reliable for constipation, liver and kidney troubles, and especially in all forms of skin disease, as this remedy."

At any rate, people who are tired of pills, cathartics and so-called blood "purifiers," will find in Stuart's Calcium Wafers a far safer, more palatable and effective preparation.

seven, one from sects; added eight young people to Bible-school, organized a Bible class of young folks. Heard every member of our newly organized Christian Endeavor pray at their meeting—fourteen of them. Preached the first foreign mission sermon heard here by our people. It has been a history-making day for the First Church.—E. E. C.

Washington, Feb. 29.—Eight confessions and by statement from Baptists during the week past; 68 accessions since Jan. 1.—E. A. COLE.

TENNESSEE.—Nashville, Feb. 29.—Two confessions at morning services yesterday at Hoodland Street Church.—JOS. DARDEN ARMISTEAD, minister.

TEXAS.—Alpine, Feb. 29.—The meeting here resulted in seven baptisms, three from the denominations and one by letter; 11 additions. J. W. Marshall did the preaching; we are highly pleased.—T. D. SECREST.

Marfa, March 1.—One baptized at Alpine Sunday. The work is in a prosperous condition. I believe that we can now build a house of worship.—T. D. SECREST.

Fort Worth, March 3.—In recent services there have been eight accessions to the Tabernacle Church. We will take the offering for foreign missions on the second Sunday in March.—JAMES S. MYERS.

The Baptists. By Henry C. Vedder, D.D. "The Story of the Churches" series. (The Baker & Taylor Co. $1.00 net.)

This admirable series, several volumes of which have already been published while others are yet to appear, is intended to furnish a set of clear, concise histories of the principal denominations. The aim is to dispel the formidable and forbidding aspect which church history too often wears, and both the size and the style of these volumes have been adjusted to that end. We may remark in passing that a volume on this scale and in this style giving a simple narrative history of the Disciples of Christ would be a welcome addition to our own literature.

Dr. Vedder is professor of church history in Crozer Theological Seminary and is a recognized authority on Baptist history. His account of the earliest advocates of Baptist principles and their relations to the sixteenth century Reformers, and of the establishment and growth of Baptist Churches in Great Britain and America, form an interesting story of a movement which the religious world could have ill afforded to do without. The tone is frankly apologetic throughout, but that quality seems inseparable from denominational history.

Dr. Vedder's allusion to Alexander Campbell's transit through the Baptist fold and to the beginning of our own movement is doubly interesting: first, because he perpetuates, in part, Dr. Whitsett's exploded myth about the intimate relation of Mr. Campbell's doctrinal position with that of the Sandemanians; and second because, first among Baptist historians, so far as we recollect, he admits that the reformers did voice a proper protest against the extravagant emotionalism of that day. He is right in saying that the two parties probably misunderstood each other and were less far apart than they seemed. He speaks of the "irony of fate," by which the pleaders for Christian union ended by starting another denomination, but he explains that irony two pages farther on by telling how "the Baptist Churches withdrew fellowship from those who held the doctrines of the reformation."

The Yoke. By Elizabeth Miller. (Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.)

George Ebers has succeeded in making the ancient Egyptian live again for purposes of modern fiction. No one else has done so, so far as we know, until the author of "The Yoke," duplicated his success in the reviving of mummies and wove some historical and many imaginary events of four thousand years ago into a very vivid and vital romance. The deliverance of Israel from bondage in Egypt is the theme. Memphis, Thebes and Goshen are the scenes. The last year of the sojourn in Egypt is the time. Moses, Aaron, Miriam, Caleb, Joshua and Pharaoh, whose heart was hardened, are some of the characters—not the central characters in the story, of course, for that would have made the novelist's task quite impossible, but as majestic figures which now and again cross the stage and mingle with the less exalted personages who are working out the events of the story. The author has dealt reverently with her difficult theme. Israel's consciousness of the nearness of Jehovah and of his special care is the fundamental fact upon which the whole narrative is based. The plagues upon the Egyptians, embellished by incident and detail, are introduced with dramatic effect and the climax is reached in the deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh's pursuing army. The historical and archaeological details have apparently been well studied.

March Magazines.

Westward Ho! to the far east is the watchword of the newspaper and magazines just now. The Booklover's Magazine begins in its March issue a series of articles entitled "The Two Pacifics," by Harold Bolce, who is to spend a year in studying and writing upon the situation in Japan, China and Russia.

The Outlook is sending George Kennan to the scene of the war. His previous experience as a war correspondent and his special familiarity with Russian people, politics and language, will insure a competent and readable report as well as an enlightened interpretation of events in the far east.

Collier's Weekly announces that it has ten special correspondents within range of the actual or probable hostilities, including Richard Harding Davis who is now at Seoul, Korea.

The World's Work announces no special correspondents, but covers the war in its editorial survey of events with its usual clearness and accuracy.

Of the magazines which do not profess to follow current events so closely, the Century has a rather exceptionally interesting number including some good fiction. Jack London's serial, "The Sea Wolf," pursues its adventurous course with increasing intensity and excitement. As a concession to the timely interest in Oriental affairs, there is an article by Dr. A. J. Brown, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, on "Economic Changes in Asia."

Country Life in America takes one at once from the atmosphere of hostilities and economics to that of peace and flower gardens. The issue for March is a double number devoted to gardening, and it is rich in both practical and beautiful things. One exceptionally valuable article tells how to grow things on every kind of unfavorable soil and in all sorts of impossible situations, from the clay-bank of a city back-yard to the sand of an ocean beach.

In the Atlantic Monthly, Robert Herrick's story, "The Common Lot," is developing increasing strength and interest with each installment. It is the story of a young Chicago architect and his struggle for ideals and honest workmanship versus the current demand for cheap and shoddy products.

The Treasury of Religious Thought, besides its usual collection of sermons and sermon material, is publishing a series of articles on "Seven Sorts of Successful Sunday Evening Services." The one in this issue is on "The Musical Plan."

The North American Review has an article by the Japanese minister at Washington on "Why Japan Resists Russia," and one on "England and the War," by Sydney Brooks.

BY ANOINTING WITH OIL

CANCER POSITIVELY CURED WITHOUT PAIN OR DIS- FIGUREMENT.

EFFICACY OF THE TREATMENT ESTABLISHED BEYOND A QUESTION OF A DOUBT.

HUNDREDS BEING CURED.

A discovery of more than usual interest to the medical profession and the people at large has been made by Dr. D. M. Bye Co., who have been at work for years to perfect a rational treatment for cancer. After much experimenting they have perfected a Combination of Oils which will act specifically on diseased tissue, leaving unharmed the sound. The treatment, originated and perfected by them, is both local and constitutional. The Oils being powerful absorbent are applied directly to the diseased area, in external cases, and directly over the seat of the trouble in internal cases. By their selective action on the tissue of low vitality they easily accomplish the thorough dissolution of the diseased cells and destroy the germs. It is well understood in malignant diseases, all the cells are not confined to one given area, but are scattered irregularly in the surrounding tissue, some finding their way into the lymph channels and blood vessels. It is, therefore, essential that a remedy, in order to be effective, must have selective action, and farther, that a properly prepared Blood Purifier must be given. Such is the nature of this wonderful Combination of Oils. The special blood purifier acts in direct communion with the Oils, destroying the diseased cells wherever they may be found, purifying the blood, and assisting in the general up-building of the patient.

THE ONLY SUCCESSFUL TREATMENT FOR CANCER AND TUMOR.

We are justifiable in the claim that the Combination Oil Cure is the only successful remedy for cancer and malignant disease. How many, many poor sufferers have been horribly disfigured and suffered untold agony at the hands of quacks who used the burning plaster? How many have endured suffering and death from the cruel surgeon's knife? Surely it should prove a blessing to sufferers, that at last these torturous methods may be supplanted by a mild, safe and certain cure. The Oils are soothing and balmy and can be used at home with entire success. Many hundreds have been cured in this way. Read what a patient says: Columbus, Ind., Nov. 23, '03.

Dr. D. M. Bye Combination Oil Cure Co., Indianapolis, Ind.:

Dear Doctors—Having been afflicted some 15 years with a distressing skin cancer on my face and having failed to find a cure for it, I was induced, through the recommendation of the Rev. D. J. Griffith, of Scottsburg, Ind., to try your Oil treatment, and I am glad I heard of you and took your treatment. To-day my face is well and I hereby express my gratitude for the benefit and cure, received from your treatment, and would recommend your treatment to all cancer sufferers. It did it effectually and so rapidly, and the joy of it is not only cures, BUT IT IS PAINLESS. Should you feel so disposed you can publish this and refer those seriously afflicted to me.

The Quiet Hour

In the museum at Amsterdam there is a picture of a dozen faces, and beside each face is a pair of hands in different posture, some gesturing, others pointing, still others clasped, as if in prayer. The idea of the Dutch artist seems to be that the character and life of a person cannot be known unless it is seen what his hands are doing. Neither can we know whether Christians are fruitful or not unless we see what their hands have done.—Central Christian Advocate.

The strength that we want is not a brute, unregulated strength; the beauty that we want is no mere surface beauty; but we want a beauty on the surface of life that is from the central force of principle within, as the beauty on the cheek of health is from the central force at the heart.—Mark Hopkins.

There is wind enough for all the sails. Are not many Christians like sails that are furled—there, but not full, because not opened to the blessed influences of the Holy Ghost? May not this be the reason I am not the man I ought to be?—Thomas Champness.

Were the sad tablets of our hearts alone
A dreary blank, for Thee the task were slight.

To draw fair letters there and lines of light:
But while far other spectacle is shown
By them, with dismal traceries overdrawn,
O! task it seems transcending highest might,
Ever again to make them clean and white,
Effacing the sad secrets they have known.
And then what heaven were better than a name.

If there must haunt and cling unto us there
Abiding memories of sin and shame?
Dread doubt! which finds no answer anywhere
Except in Him, who with Him power did bring
To make us feel our sin an alien thing.

—R. C. Trench.

"Lead us not into temptation." No man was ever so far advanced in the divine life as not to need to utter these words. In fact the holiest breathe this petition with the most frequency. And if an angel should be sent from heaven into the midst of us, it would be ever upon his lips.—George Bowen.

Lamp to my feet! shine forth into my soul
That I may better see what way I tread
In the dark hours, and when I lose control
Of mine own steps, by vague desires misled
In faltering moments, when I scarce can pray Through failing faith, or wandering thoughts and sink

Back to my bondage, let Thy kindly ray,
Lamp to my feet! prevent me on the brink.
—Thomas William Parsons.

Lord, come to me, for I cannot go to Thee.
... The tenderness of Thine infinitude looks upon me from those heavens. Thou art in them and in me. Because Thou thinkest,
I think; I am Thine—all Thine. I abandon myself to Thee. Fill me with Thyself. When I am full of Thee, my griefs themselves will grow golden in Thy sunlight. Thou holdest them and their cause, and wilt find some nobler atonement between them than vile forgetfulness or the death of love. Lord, let me help those that are wretched, because they do not know Thee. Let me tell them that Thou, the Life, must need suffer for and with them that they may be made partakers of Thine ineffable peace.—George MacDonald.

The Way to Heaven.

Heaven is not reached at a single bound;
But we build the ladder by which we rise,
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And mount to its summit round by round.

I count this thing to be grandly true,
That a noble deed is a step toward God—
Lifting the soul from the common sod
To purer air and broader view.

We rise by things that are 'neath our feet,
By what we have mastered of good and gain;
By pride deposed and the passion slain,
And the vanquished ills that we hourly meet.

We hope, we resolve, we aspire, we pray,
And think that we mount the air on wings,
Beyond the recall of sensual things,
While our feet still cling to the heavy clay,

Wings for the angels, but feet for the men!
We may borrow the wings to find the way—
We may hope and resolve, and aspire and pray,
But our feet must rise, or we fall again.

Only in dreams is a ladder thrown
From the weary earth to the sapphire walls;
But the dreams depart, and the vision falls,
And the sleeper wakes on his pillow of stone.

Heaven is not gained at a single bound;
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And mount to its summit round by round.
—J. G. Holland.

Theater-Going for Children.

The tragedy at the matinee in the Iroquois Theater was a veritable "slaughter of the innocents." It is pitiful to read the lists of the dead and their ages: "Mary, nine," "Ethel, six," "Harold, four," "Margaret, twelve," "Paul, two," and so on through hundreds of names, each one of which means a desolated home, and a broken-hearted father and mother.

In view of the fact that so large a proportion of the audience on that dreadful day were children, the question of the advisability of theater-going as an amusement for children is being widely discussed, and from different standpoints. Much is being said both from the moral and from the physiological points of view, and there is still much that may be said from the psychological; but in order to say this wisely we must investigate the process of psychological development in the child.

At birth the babe is blind and deaf, and, we may say, without a brain. True he has brain cells, but they are mostly embryonic, and the principal business of his child-life is to build a brain out of these undeveloped cells. The brain-builder begins at once through the sensations brought to it from the outer world. Light-waves strike upon the retina, and are transmitted to the brain and the child begins to see. Day after day the vibrations pour in, and little by little the child comes to recognize them as mother's face, or his bottle; growing slowly into a complete recognition of the objects around him.

Sound-waves pelt his tympanum and are transmitted through bony chain and perilymph to the brain, and in time differentiate themselves into his mother's voice, his rattle, the bark of a dog or the mew of the cat, until at last he has built up brain structure that recognizes all the ordinary sounds of daily life. In the same way, through a gradual unfolding or development of brain cells, he grows into an understanding of his environment, and in the same way he grows into the use of his voluntary muscles.

At first his movements are aimless and largely reflex, but gradually they become orderly and under control of his will. In order that his development may be symmetrical the various stimuli should be given in an orderly manner. That is, there should be no forcing of the process of brain building. Nature does furnish him the material for brain growth as fast as he can use it, and makes no insistent demand for attention in advance of his powers. The child left to himself in his early life will find outdoors the objects that claim his notice and interest him, and they present themselves to him as fast as he is able to receive them. In outdoor play he is happy hour after hour, and it is only when he is brought into the restricted limits of indoor life that he becomes restless and needs to be entertained.

Parents who take their children to the theater to be amused make the mistake of judging the child-nature from the adult standpoint. Children do not need amusement. They need occupation and opportunity for self-expression. We are quite apt to consider the play of children as their amusement, whereas it is their occupation, their serious business. By means of play they are being educated into the possession of their bodies and minds.

Let us examine the theater-going for children, bearing in mind these few fundamental psychological principles: viz., What the child needs is an opportunity for brain-building through occupation and self-expression, and through the orderly presentation of the various stimuli which, suited to his comprehension, give him this opportunity.

The very young child, taken to the theater, is, in the first place, bewildered by the multiplicity of sights and sounds. His immature brain is not prepared for such a complexity of impressions. He is dazed, and not infrequently frightened. Many times parents are surprised that what they had imagined would give the child delight has only caused fear. They have fancied that the spectacular representation of a fairy tale or of some child's story would give the child the same pleasure that the simple home-telling of the story had given. As has been said, they judged the child from the standpoint of the adult. With their broader knowledge of life they could disentangle the multiplicity of sounds, the shifting panorama of colors and movements and make of them something comprehensible; while to the child, untrained and inexperienced, all is at first a chaos of noise and motion and color.

After a time he will become able to see part of that which is portrayed before him, but much of it, being incomprehensible, is by him unseen and unheard. It is true that after a series of experiences he may become able to see and comprehend the play, but this indicates that he has been stimulated to an unnatural development of brain power and that means a disturbing of the balance and consequent inharmoniousness. He has really been subjected to a species of intoxication, from which there must sometime come a reaction.

The theater-going child becomes nervous, irritable, demanding amusement, an unchild-like, and therefore an undesirable condition. The normal child finds his delight in self-express-sion and asks only the opportunity for that expression. By the gift of elaborate and perfectly-completed toys, and by teaching him to sit still and be amused by theatrical representations, the child is educated into that most unfortunate condition of looking to outward agencies for entertainment. The result is that he loses the power of self-expression and early become blasé.

But, some may ask, Why, if it is allowable to tell these tales to the children, is it not allowable for them to see them portrayed on the stage? Is it not merely another method of telling the story with effective illustrations?

In the mere telling of the story there is no forcing of the child's mind. He is left free to exercise his own imagination, to set the tale to pictures of his own making; so the story-hearing becomes to him an opportunity for self-expression. Each child illustrates the tale according to his own mental acquirements.

In the stage presentation there is nothing for him to do. He is left simply passive. But is there not something for his imagination to work on as he recalls the various scenes? Unfortunately, yes. He has been introduced to an unreal world in such a way that it seems real, and knowing nothing of real life he is led to imagine that what he has seen is real; so false ideas may have been engendered which may eventuate later in wrong conduct. In telling a story to a child you can omit, or add, or qualify, as you see his special need would indicate, and so make the tale a medium for communicating to him some lesson.

Even the portrayal of virtues may have undesirable results. It is a well-known axiom of educators that to have the emotions of pity and generosity aroused with no opportunity for their active employment is detrimental. The child may see fictitious woes and weep over them, with the only result that he is satisfied to see, and do nothing.

This constant arousing of emotions, even though they be desirable in themselves, tends to create an unbalanced condition, a nervous state that borders upon hysteria. This is a poor preparation for approaching adolescence, that time when, because of the endowment of new powers, the youth is brought into a world of strange emotions and when he needs all possible self-control to help him over this crisis.

If the theater is objectionable for the child who is approaching puberty, how much more undesirable is it for the growing boy and girl who is passing through this great change! This is the period when the feelings have dominion, when emotions rule. To add to their power through the influence of the drama is to add to the dangers of this critical time. Now, if ever, should the youth be led away from thoughts of romance into the domain of facts. Now is the time for intellectual pursuits, for study of nature, for a quiet, wholesome life, free from excitement, free from all the meretricious surroundings of society life, either on the stage or off; the time for early hours, simple food, pure air and the light of day; instead of late bedtime and late rising, unwholesome eatables at unreasonable hours, viti-

The theater managers in Chicago are clamoring for permission to reopen their places of amusement, urging as a reason, not the present loss by closure, but the fact that people are learning to be entertained at home. The tide that has turned so strongly towards the theater is, through its closing, ebbing away from their doors, and will not readily be induced to return to its former channels. We sincerely trust that this opinion may prove a true prophecy, and that, for the sake of the children and youth, the home and family circle may be rediscovered as the true theater of enjoyment.—*Mary Wood-Allen, M. On the first Sunday that a collection plate, instead of a nice, secretive, embroidered bag, was used in a certain London church, a bright yellow shining piece appeared among the coppers and three-penny bits. Monday morning brought callers to the vestry. When the fifth came, he said anxiously: "I am very sorry to trouble you, but I put a sovereign into the plate yesterday by oversight. Could I have it, as I really cannot afford it?"

"Ah," replied the vicar, "you are the fifth already that has made the same melancholy blunder. The church warden tells me that sovereign is only a gilt shilling."—Ram's Horn.

The Gods We Make.

"These be thy gods."—Exodus 32:4.

The heathen man, he bows him down
With a bowl of fruits and rice
Before a god with a brazen front
And he makes his sacrifice.
He puts his rice at the altar base
And he burns his tapers there;
But the god looks on with a sullen face
And a stern and stony stare.

And we—we build us gods to-day
And we make for each a shrine,
But lack the heathenish pride to say
Of the image: "It is mine."
We mold our gods of heart's desires,
Yet we fear to speak the name,
Though we watch and tend at the altar fires
In the shrines of Gold and Fame.

We bow us down with sacrifice
Of the best our hands may give;
We pay full well with the heaviest price
That a man may pay, and live.
The grinning god of Gold looms high
By the figure frail of Fame—
And we sully our souls with a loose-tongued lie
Lest our gods may give us shame.

The heathen man—, But he is blind!
And he can not see his god
With the hungering hand of a priest behind
Is a shapeless, senseless clod.
We laugh in knowing glee at him,
At his idol crude and old;
And the censer we heap to its brazen brim
At the shrines of Fame and Gold.

—W. D. Nesbit in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

John Earl's Noon Hour.

John Earl was employed in one of the largest cotton mills in Lowell. The work was hard, the hours long, and, worst of all, the pay small, with little or no prospect of increase. His condition was no worse than that of hundreds of others employed in the same mill, but somehow it seemed to disturb him more. He believed that he was capable of better things. One noon, while eating his dinner beside the machine he operated, the thought occurred to him, "Why am I wasting the noon hour each day?" Each year he spent three hundred days or thereabouts in the mill, and the possibilities of those three hundred noon hours appealed to the young man. Two weary at night to turn his attention to serious study, he had about given up hope of bettering his condition.

Being naturally a good penman, and fond of mathematics, he turned his attention to figures and bookkeeping. He thought that during the ensuing five years, while his companions were idling and telling stories, he could master the subject that interested him.

The following morning, on his way to the mill, Earl purchased an arithmetic and, when the noon hour came, having eaten his dinner, he made a beginning on the course he had marked out for himself.

Of course, the men laughed when they saw him at work with his paper and pencil—that was to be expected—and Earl was not disturbed in the least. In fact, he was so engrossed with his work that he heard but few of their jibes. The only thing that seriously annoyed him was the one-o'clock whistle.

One noon the superintendent of the mill chanced to pass the young man while he was busy with his study. He noted the nature of the book, but said nothing. That afternoon, however, he referred to the occasion, asking the foreman who the young man was, and what was his ability as an employee.

"Oh, you mean John Earl," said the foreman. "He's the best workman in my room, sir, but I'm afraid he isn't going to stay with us long."

"Keep your eye on him," said the superintendent, "that kind of a man is worth holding."

Five years, the time that Earl had first allotted for the completion of his studies, had passed. One morning the foreman stopped before Earl's machine and informed him that the superintendent wished to see him in the office.

"Haskell has a bone to pick with you, John," said the foreman, striving desperately to conceal a smile, as he noted Earl's bewilderment. "Don't think ill of me, John; I had to report you."

"Report what?" demanded Earl, flushing.

"You will find out when you reach the office," said the foreman, beating a hasty retreat among the noisy looms.

"Mr. Earl?" queried the superintendent, turning in his chair as the young man approached his desk a few minutes later. The "Mister" perplexed Earl even more than the foreman's words. Ordinarily the employees, when addressed by the heads of the departments, were spoken to in a most concise form. The "Mister" was quite without precedent, but he replied in the affirmative.

"I think that it was nearly five years ago that I chanced to see you one noon at work over some problems. I spoke to your foreman about it, and told him to keep a sharp eye on you. We have been quite a while in coming to a decision in the matter, but we have finally decided that you have outlived your usefulness as an operator."

Poor Earl crimsoned clear to the roots of his hair. He knew that he had attended to his work faithfully, and for a moment the seeming injustice of the superintendent's remarks fairly stunned him.

The superintendent nervously stroked his beard as he noted Earl's amazement, and then resumed. "For some time past we have been dissatisfied with the work"—John was deathly pale now, for he had had time to recall the fact that there was rent due, and fuel to buy, and, strive as he would, he was unable to keep back the tears—"of our first assistant bookkeeper," finished the superintendent, smiling for the first time; "to-day we discharged him. Are you ready, Mr. Earl, to take his place?"—Frederick E. Burnham, in Sunday-School Herald.

How to Walk.

You have sometimes seen the top of a wall covered with mortar, and in the mortar pieces of glass are stuck all the way along, so as to prevent boys from climbing and going along. You have also seen a cat walk along the top of that wall. That was walking "circumspectly." How it picked its way! With what carefulness it put down the foot every time. It made progress by walking very carefully, and looking for each place where the foot was to be put among those pieces of glass.

You and I have to walk like that, if we are going to do anything for God in the world. You can't go through a single day carelessly and let things go as they will. Every step must be

A New Catarrh Cure Secures National Popularity in Less than One Year.

Throughout a great nation of eighty million it is a desperate struggle to secure even a recognition for a new article to say nothing of achieving popular favor, and yet within one year Stuart's Catarrh

Tablets, the new catarrh cure, has met with such success that to-day it can be found in every drug store throughout the United States and Canada.

To be sure a large amount of advertising was necessary in the first instance to bring the remedy to the attention of the public, but everyone familiar with the subject knows that advertising alone never made any article permanently successful. It must have in addition absolute, undeniable merit, and this the new catarrh cure certainly possesses in a marked degree.

Physicians, who formerly depended upon inhalers, sprays and local washes or ointments, now use Stuart's Catarrh Tablets because, as one of the most prominent stated, these tablets contain [in pleasant, convenient form all the really efficient catarrh remedies, such as red gum, blood root and similar antiseptics.

They contain no cocaine nor opiate, and are given to little children with entire safety and benefit.

Dr. J. J. Reitiger, of Covington, Ky., says: "I suffered from catarrh in my head and throat every fall, with stoppage of the nose and irritation in the throat affecting my voice and often extending to the stomach, causing catarrh of the stomach. I bought a fifty cent package of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets at my druggist's, carried them in my pocket and used them faithfully, and the way in which they cleared my head and throat was certainly remarkable. I had no catarrh last winter and spring and consider myself entirely free from any catarrhal trouble."

Mrs. Jerome Ellison, of Wheeling, W. Va., writes: "I suffered from catarrh nearly my whole life and last winter my two children also suffered from catarrhal colds and sore throat so much they were out of school a large portion of the winter. My brother who was cured of catarrhal deafness by using Stuart's Catarrh Tablets urged me to try them so much that I did so and am truly thankful for what they have done for myself and children. I always keep a box of the tablets in the house and at the first appearance of a cold or sore throat we nip it in the bud and catarrh is no longer a household affliction with us."

Full sized packages of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are sold for fifty cents at all druggists.

CHAPTER V.—CONCLUDED.

"Let's sit down," said George. They sat down under the pine tree, their heads almost touching the prickly branches. "Do you notice," he said, "that on the far side, you can sit, and not be seen very plainly from the house? Well, that's part of the story. This is a story of a story, and I'm not proud of it. Somehow or other, I had begun to read dime novels. It seemed to break out in our school all at once, like measles. Somebody lent me one, at first, and it was so exciting you wanted to go right on after you reached the end. Mother saw me with one, and told me never to read another,—that it wasn't good for a fellow."

"Why! brother reads 'em," said Flora, "and ma don't care anything about it."

"Mother," continued George, "was so in earnest about it, that I promised never to read another."

"Brother don't read anything else," observed Flora.

"Yes, that the trouble," rejoined the other; "you don't care for anything else; so it stands between you and good useful books."

"Well, I don't like any kind of a book," Flora observed, "so I guess I'm safe. Go on!"

"And I promised never to read another. Well, one day I did. A fellow would lend it to me, and I took it, not meaning to read it, but I didn't like to tell him I'd promised mother to quit. You see I was ashamed of doing right. I brought the dime novel home, and it had a picture of a lady handing the detective a dead man's hand. I put the book in my trunk, but I wanted to know about the dead man's hand. Seemed like I couldn't think of anything else. At last I decided to just read the first page to see how it started. I did. Then I couldn't stop. It made my hair fairly bristle. The characters got into an awful difficulty in the first column, and I stayed with 'em."

"I would have, too," said Flora.

"But I'd promised not," George reminded her.

"Well," said Flora, "what of it?"

George did not know how to meet this question, which was delivered with an air of finality.

"When ma is unreasonable," said Flora, "I promise, to put an end to the discussion. She forgets all about it, afterwards. She don't really care what I do, if I go with the right people, and keep my clothes nice. Didn't you ever promise things, just to put a stop to a discussion? It's the easiest way I know."

"I try not to break my word," said George.

"How do you keep from it?"

"Why! I don't make a promise, unless I believe I can fulfil it."

"Then how can you get out of discussions?"

"I just discuss, too. I stay in 'em."

"That's tedious."

"Yes, but to break a promise is wrong."

"Everything pleasant is wrong," said Flora impatiently. "Of course, I know that! Go on with the pine-tree story."

"So I came out here under the tree, on this side, where they couldn't see me from the house, and I read and read and read; and the characters kept getting into one scrape after another, each one tighter than the last. You couldn't stop. You had to find out how they escaped. And right while they were escaping, another terrible danger was gathering from all around. It was a day like this,—beautiful sunshine, and the shadows fell that way. Those shadows of the trees and of the house seem like cool hands, drawing me back into the past. Well, suddenly I saw the flutter of a skirt, drawing near."

"It must have been your mother," said Flora, "for it looks like she was in everything."

"It was," said George, "and then my promise came back to me. I hadn't really forgotten making the promise, but I had kept from thinking about it. And it was the fear of being caught that made the moment awful—just awful! I never had broken my word to her. Suddenly I crammed the dime novel under my coat. She came right on, and sat down beside me, as she generally did, but she seemed to be watching something,—only there wasn't anything to see. She didn't look at me,—gave but one glance. I expect I was white. I would have given anything to know if she had seen me hiding the dime novel. I didn't think she could have seen it, and when she began to talk, her voice sounded natural. I imagine mine didn't! She didn't stay long. About two weeks passed,—they have nothing to do with this tree,—so I'll not say anything about them, except that they were the most miserable of my life, for all the time I was wondering if she had caught me that time, hiding the dead man's hand and the detective under my coat."

"Whose hand was it?" inquired Flora.

"I never found out, for I have not read a line of a dime novel since that afternoon. Mother played with me, and seemed almost as she had been before. I couldn't tell if she was exactly the same. I was afraid if I confessed, she'd never believe in me again. And I was afraid if I didn't confess, it would be worse, if she really knew about the pine-tree reading. My! I wouldn't go through those two weeks again, not even to have mother back; for every minute of them was a torture."

"I don't understand it, at all," said Flora, "but I like to hear you tell it. I never could feel like you did. I always do what I please, unless ma tears up about it,—then I do as she makes me. But mothers are so different!"

"One night," said George softly, "I missed mother from the house, and father didn't know she was gone, because he was writing about the tariff, or about the money question for his paper,—he hardly ever knew what was going on, at home. I slipped out into the yard to hunt her,—still with that toothache in my heart I'd had so long,—that's the only way I can express my feelings. Suddenly I heard a soft kind of sound, like a half-whisper; it came from under this pine tree. I knew it must be mother, and I tiptoed through the long grass, wondering whom she could be talking to. I crept around on the other side, and I could see her, not very plainly. She was dressed in white,—she liked to dress that way. She was on her knees. She was praying. I heard her say, "My George!"—He stopped abruptly, and the tears showed in his eyes.

"Go on," said Flora breathlessly.

"Everything was all right after that," said George vaguely.

"But that isn't the end of the story," cried Flora. "What happened?"

"There's no more to tell," returned George smiling, and rubbing his eyes.

"I know," cried Flora, grabbing his hand, and giving it a squeeze between her pretty little palms. "I know just how it ended. I like this story best of all. Let's go away, now." As they left the tree, she laughingly guided him by the hand, swinging it back and forth till their arms rocked like a cradle. She led him to a rustic bench that stood in a summerhouse. The summerhouse was covered with flowering vines, and inside, potted plants along the walls, threw out a delicious perfume.

Publishers' Notes.

"How can you sell such books at such prices," writes a friend who has lately made an order for our cheaper books. Think of "The S. S. Helper," by J. H. Hardin, for 10 cents, and "Christian Baptism," by Campbell, at 50 cents! It is like finding money to order from our "special list" of bargain books.

"Helps to Faith," the new book by J. H. Garrison, is divided into two parts. Part One is "Some Facts on Which Faith Rests," and Part Two, "Some Obstacles to Faith." There are eighteen chapters in Part One and twelve chapters in Part Two. The book contains 245 pages, bound in cloth binding. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

"Singing birds and blooming flowers," make young people think of "orange blossoms" and the attendant ceremonies; and then come the demands for marriage certificates, of which we have a fine line, at such prices as enable our minister friends to present these pleasant testimonials to all whom they may unite in the holy bonds. Write us.

In connection with our present studies in the Life of Christ, many of our ministers and superintendents are conducting normal classes on either the Life of Christ, the Land of Palestine, or the People of Christ's Time, and all of these are fully and pointedly given in W. W. Dowling's Normal Instructor, in seven parts, at 15 cents each, or $1.50 per dozen, postpaid.

The Choral Festival is a handsome book in board binding that has had an enormous run, but many of our friends have not seen it. Should you want recitations, prose or poetry, dialogues or other character of good matter for church, school and Endeavor entertainments, this book will fully meet your wants. Desirous of having our friends use this fine volume, we have cut the price in half, and will send out what we have at $.25.

Mrs. A. Jennie Ridgeway and her husband, before going on their trip to the World's Convention at Jerusalem, very wisely ordered the entire set of Dowling's Normal Instructor, so as to post up on the the Land especially before going; and all the other delegates would do likewise if they were as fore-sighted as these two friends. Heed this advice and send in your orders at once, as we may be crowded toward starting time. Price, 15 cents for each part.

Louis, has gone upon the war path. Saturday, March 12, was the day of the Democratic primaries in this city. The main contest was between Folk and Hawes for Democratic nomination for Governor. According to the official count the vote was about three to one in favor of Hawes. But the result of the primaries is less significant than the methods by which this result was obtained. This method was nothing less than to march bands of toughs and thugs around from one polling place to another to vote again and again in favor of the machine delegates, and to crowd respectable citizens out of line and slug those who could not be crowded out. The evidence shows that this was done with the support and connivance of the police force. The St. Louis newspapers without regard to party are denouncing it as the most infamous exhibition of lawlessness ever given even in this machine-ridden city. One of the deacons of the Central Christian Church of this city was dragged out of the line in front of the polling place by ruffians brought in from another part of the city, and was knocked on the head and left unconscious in a hall way. He was merely trying to vote for Folk. The Post-Dispatch (independent Democratic) sent a reporter into the camp of the machine hoodlums disguised as an ally, and he was given a list of names and instructions how to cast as many votes as there were names on the list. The votes were to be for Hawes. Dr. Frank G. Tyrrell, pastor of the Mt. Cabanne Christian Church, reports that, when he was attempting to cast his own vote near the time for the closing of the polls, he and other residents of the precinct were crowded back by roughs and repeaters who had been voting there all the afternoon, and who had no right to cast even one vote at that place, as they were not residents of the ward. His appeals to the police for protection were ignored.

What is the meaning of this rioting and violence at the polls? Does it mean that the lawless and criminal element finds here an outlet for its vicious impulses from pure love of violence? Yes, but more than that. Does it mean that the criminal element is fighting to keep in power the machine which nourishes and protects it? Yes, but more than that. It means that there are interests supposed to be respectable which are using these criminals and outlaws for their own purposes. There are great corporations which know that it is cheaper for them to buy the friendship of the machine than to pay their just proportion of state taxes. There are supposedly respectable business men who would rather have a state governed by a set of rascals from whom they can buy special privileges than by honest men who will enforce the laws. These are the people who are responsible. These are the men whom the "Indians" are really serving. The corrupt politicians are only the brokers who stand between the "respectable" criminals and the plug-uglies who do the dirty work, and deliver the goods to those who put up the money.

The Christian Ministerial Association of St. Louis, meeting at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on Monday morning, adopted the following resolutions:

In view of the lawlessness and violence perpetrated at the polls on Saturday, March 12, be it resolved:

1. That in common with all good citizens, irrespective of party, we deplore the reign of lawlessness and view it with humiliation and alarm;

2. That we look with pity and contempt upon the "Indians" and other criminals who were used by their masters in said election, and denounce the Board of Police Commissioners, chief of police, sergeants, captains and all higher officials who seem to have been the promoters and protectors of lawlessness, and call on them for a public explanation;

3. That we call upon the 170,000 members of our church in Missouri to join with all other churches and good people in a determined and sustained warfare against commercial and political corruption and the control of men vicious and base;

4. That we appreciate the help the press of all parties has rendered for honesty and fairness, and request them to continue their good offices.

Some stormy sessions of the House of Representatives followed the presentation of a report of the committee on post-offices, embodying data furnished by Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Bristow, in which considerably more than half of the members of the House, of both parties, were charged with being implicated in not very creditable transactions in connection with the leasing of buildings for post-offices and securing increased allowances for clerk hire in third class offices. The report aroused great indignation on both sides of the House, and the committee made only a feeble stand against the storm of protest. A proposal to authorize a general congressional investigation of the affairs of the postal department has been hanging fire in the House for over two months. This episode precipitated a vote on this resolution and it was carried with only two negative votes. A committee of seven is to be appointed to make the investigation. One member expressed the general sentiment by saying that, since these charges of improper influence had been brought against congressmen, "I want to investigate both myself and Bristow." Congressional investigations are not, at best, a very effective instrument. At least two of them in recent years failed to uncover the irregularities which were unearthed by the investigation carried on within the department during the past three months. But as an evidence of good faith a congressional investigation just now will have some value.

The Senate committee on privileges and elections has taken up the case of Senator Dietrich of Nebraska who is charged with making merchandise of his senatorial influence in locating post-offices and appointing post-masters.

The inquiry into the case of Mr. Smoot is shedding a lurid light on Mormonism and a deep gloom over the Mormons. Some of the More Light on Mormonism. evidence presented to the Senate committee has been unprintable, and nearly all of it would be unbelievable if we take the word of those who have been accustomed to say that Mormonism is an innocent and maligned system and that polygamy is as extinct in Utah as slavery in Massachusetts. But the evidence comes from the Mormon apostles themselves. As a sample of Mormon sophistry on the polygamy question, the testimony of Mr. Charles F. Merrill, a son of "Apostle" Merrill by his third plural wife, is worth noting. Read it carefully and note the argument, bearing in mind that, while a Mormon may have married a plural wife in good faith prior to 1890, he could not possibly do so after that year since the "revelation" abrogating polygamy was then delivered.

Charles F. Merrill said he was married first in 1887 to a wife that died in 1889, and that he married his "legal wife," Chloe Hendricks, in 1891, and had five children by her. He married another wife in 1888. He has had four children by that wife, the oldest of which is nine years and the youngest two and a half years. Their mother's name was Anna B. Stoddard. "The marriage to my legal wife in 1891," said Mr. Merrill, "was solemnized by my father."

"Were you living with Anna B. Stoddard when you married the woman you call your legal wife?" was asked.

"I was," answered the witness.

Mr. Merrill said he has now two wives, and is cohabiting with both. Mr. Foraker asked the witness, "Is not the woman you married in 1888 your legal wife?"

"No, sir," Mr. Merrill explained that when he married in 1888 he had a wife living, and that he understood that under the laws that marriage was not legal, and that therefore, his marriage in 1891, after the death of his first wife in 1889, made his last marriage a legal one.

The witness said he lived with both wives, but that they had different homes in Richmond, Utah, about a mile apart.

In regard to his family, Mr. Merrill said he had a father with six wives, and that he had twenty brothers and seventeen sisters. He thought three of his brothers have married plural wives, and that two of his sisters had married into polygamous families.

Mr. Merrill's argument, then, is that, if a man had any number of wives prior to the anti-polygamy manifesto of 1890, he might still marry one more after that manifesto, provided the first of the series is no longer living. These plural marriages are not considered legal enough to prevent him from taking another wife, but they are legal enough to justify him in continuing to live with all of the women.

Especially interesting is the testimony of Mr. Smoot's fellow-apostle, Francis M. Lyman, who is chairman of the twelve apostles and has been designated to succeed Joseph Smith as president of the Mormon church. The report of his testimony, while it may or may not be considered as bearing on the question of Mr. Smoot's qualifications for a seat in the Senate, gives some pertinent information about Mormonism:

"Are you a polygamist?" Mr. Taylor asked, and the witness replied, "Yes." He said that he had had three wives and that two of them are still living. Mr. Lyman said he had been one of the signers of the prayer for amnesty, pledging himself to all that it contained.

Mr. Taylor read portions of the prayer "Did you," he asked, "interpret that to mean that you would abstain from polygamous cohabitation?"

This was not answered directly, but Mr. Lyman admitted that he knew that in living in polygamy he was disobeying both the law of the land and the rule of his church. He also said that he was not only now living in polygamous cohabitation, but that he expected to continue so to live. He said he considered it his duty to live with and protect his wives. He said Mr. Smoot had never reproved him for living in polygamy, either in public or in the apostolic meetings.

Mr. Lyman said missionaries never touch upon the subject of polygamy unless the theory is assailed.

"Do they defend or denounce it?" was asked.

"They would not denounce it," said Mr. Lyman.

"Did Senator Smoot know you were living with plural wives?" was asked.

Mr. Lyman answered that Senator Smoot did not know, as he never had met any one of his wives. He said that the people in general in Utah knew, but that he did not think Mr. Smoot had any knowledge of the fact. The witness responded several times that the people must have known, but that Senator Smoot did not, whereupon Senator Hoar demanded to know what the witness meant by such answers. The witness then said that Senator Smoot probably knew just as much about the question as the people in general.

"Do you take back what you said, then, that the people knew and Senator Smoot did not know?" asked Senator Hoar.

"I take that back."

"Don't you think, Mr. Apostle, that it behooves you to be a little careful about what you say, so that you will not have anything to take back?" asked the Senator, severely.

Senator Hoar followed this question by asking the witness if he had received a revelation concerning what he was to testify to on the stand, and whether such a revelation could be responsible for his change of mind in regard to the questions asked.

"Are your answers here by order of the Lord? Are they given in your human or inspired capacity?" the Senator asked.

"I answer as the Spirit of the Lord directs."

"Then it was the Spirit of the Lord which directed you to make the answers you just took back and which you said was a mistake?"

The witness hesitated and Senator Hoar remarked, "Well, if you can't answer that, I don't blame you."

The past week has been marked by continued activity and advances on the part of the Japanese. The Russians claim that the bombardment of Vladivostok, Sunday, March 6, inflicted no injury upon the town. It now appears that the Russian squadron was not there at the time, and one report has it that the squadron has been caught at sea not far from Vladivostok and defeated in a naval battle. There have been renewed bombardments of Port Arthur and Dalny, and the Russians admit considerable loss of life. A naval battle on Thursday between the Port Arthur squadron and the Japanese fleet resulted in the loss of one vessel on each side, according to Russian reports. The Japanese have landed at Hai Yan Tau, a few miles northeast of Port Arthur, and from this base will continue their operations against the latter place. An unconfirmed report via Tokio says that Port Arthur has already fallen. Admiral Makaroff arrived in Port Arthur last week to take command of the Russian fleet. It is an unenviable job. His first effort will be to unite the Port Arthur and Vladivostok squadrons.

The operations on land have not been much more encouraging to the Russians than those at sea. Viceroy Alexieff, who moved his headquarters from Port Arthur to Mukden two weeks ago, has decided to fall back to Harbin, six hundred miles north of Port Arthur. The army corps coming out from Russia over the Siberian railroad, has been halted at Harbin, and there seems to be no expectation that it will advance farther. It is believed that the Russians have evacuated Wiju and there has been a land battle of some importance near the Yalu River, as the result of which the Japanese seem to have gained a clear way across the neck of the Liao Tung Peninsula to Niu Chwang. It is even reported, though without confirmation, that this important Manchurian port has fallen into the hands of the Japanese. Allowing for a considerable margin of error in all of these reports, it seems fairly safe to say that Korea has been almost or quite cleared of Russian forces, except possibly in the extreme north, and that the Japanese have begun their invasion of Manchuria. Their further advance will be through hostile country, and greater difficulties may be expected.

Marquis Ito has gone as a special commissioner to Seoul to cement a closer alliance between Japan and Korea. Russia has given repeated warnings to China against interference, but so great is her interest in the war that there is more danger of intervention here than from any other quarter. The swift and brilliant Japanese victories up to the present time do not necessarily indicate that the end of the war is near. Japan is just coming to the hard part of her work. Even if she succeeds in occupying all the territory south and east of Harbin, the question is how she can inflict upon Russia serious enough damage to compel her to make satisfactory terms of peace.

A Chicago bank recently adopted a rule that no employe should be permitted to marry unless he is receiving a salary of more than $1,000 a year.

This action was not taken because of concern for the welfare of the young men and young women who might otherwise marry on less than $1,000 a year, but because the directors of the bank think the temptation to dishonesty is too great when a man is trying to support a family on that meagre salary. There has been a good deal of semi-serious discussion of this decision. The prevailing opinion seems to be that it is a mistake, and we believe this is the case. More young men are tempted to embezzlement by playing the races than by anxiety to provide for their families. If a young man, whether he is earning more or less than $1,000, marries the right sort of girl, the chances are that he will thereafter be a more reliable member of society, as a bank clerk or in any other capacity. If he marries the wrong sort—but no one ever claimed that marriage is a success when a man marries the wrong sort of woman or a woman marries the wrong sort of man. From the time of the fabulous "Peter, Peter, pumpkin-eater," there have always been persons of like incompetency with that celebrated individual who "had a wife and couldn't keep her." And now that his simple expedient is no longer practicable, it behooves every young man who contemplates matrimony to be sure he can afford it. But the level requirement of a thousand-dollar income does not afford the needed safeguard.

Unconquered Land.—X.

Continuous Progress According to Basic Principles.

It remains for history to furnish an example of continuous progress on the part of any religious movement, according to its basic principles, and in pursuance of its original aim, without the disruption of its unity by internal strife and division. It is too early yet to say whether certain lines of cleavage among us will crystallize and harden into divisions, or whether with the passing away of extreme influences there will be such intercourse and exchange of thought as will render division impossible. If we shall succeed in maintaining, not uniformity of opinion and taste, but unity of faith and fellowship, while moving forward along the lines of our original aims and principles, we shall have furnished to the religious world an object lesson of the greatest value.

One reason why many of our predecessors in the field of religious reformation have failed in the respect above mentioned is that they limited themselves by certain authoritative declarations of doctrine and practice, which they have not been able to overcome without a sort of ecclesiastical cataclysm, resulting in division. It is not easy to escape the tyranny of ideas once they have been crystallized in the form of a creed, which in many minds comes to be regarded as too sacred to be changed or tampered with. It was a very wise decision of the originators of our own movement that they would formulate no such creed, but commit themselves to the leadership of Jesus Christ and his inspired word. With such a basis it would seem entirely practicable for a religious movement to adjust itself to the new conditions of each age, while remaining true to its essential principles.

There are some good people who become alarmed when you speak of progress, as if progress were not an essential law of life. Some one has truly said that evolution can only equal involution; in other words, that nothing can be evolved that is not previously involved. It is also true that what is involved in any individual or organized movement, must be evolved if the individual or organization ever realizes the end of its existence. Now there are certain things implicit, or, if you please, involved, in the very nature of our religious movement, which must be permitted to develop, which indeed we must strive to make explicit, as the growth of the movement and the needs of the world may require. We have already spoken of the problem of our relation to other religious bodies—a problem involved in our position on Christian unity. This was implicit in our position from the beginning, but in the fullness of time this problem had to be worked out and such solution found as would be in harmony with our original aim and with the principles relating thereto. This is what we mean by the continuous progress of our movement according to its basic principles.

But this is only one illustration. There are many other things involved in our movement which remain to be worked out and expressed in actual life. Let us consider two respects in which our religious movement needs and in due time will have a more adequate expression. One of these is literature. Rightly enough, action has preceded any large amount of writing. So far the literature produced, which is by no means inconsiderable, has had a very practical character and purpose. It has been of immense value in prosecuting our work. But, from the very nature of the case, it has been limited. There has scarcely been time yet for great and permanent contributions to theological thought in the form of books. These come later in the history of a people. The point of view we occupy as religious reformers, being eminently Christocentric, is bound to influence all our theological thinking, and to produce, in time, a theology in harmony with that conception of Christianity. Our view of man, too, and of human responsibility, must necessarily exercise a strongly modifying influence on the older theologies which had their birth under a very different conception of human nature. Other modifying and controlling views of truth among the basic principles of our movement will readily suggest themselves to the thoughtful. Every religious movement that is to permanently influence the thought of the world must embody itself in literature—didactic, historical, devotional and theological. Something has been done in this direction, but much remains to be done.

The other respect in which our reformatory movement waits for adequate expression is what may be called applied Christianity; that is, the application of the ancient truths of the gospel to the domestic, social, political and industrial life of men to-day. It no longer needs to be argued that religion is the great regulative principle of conduct in all the departments of human activity. But while this is admitted in theory, practice lags behind theory in this as in many other things. This is true of the whole Christian world. It would afford a powerful and convincing apologetic for the position we occupy, however, if it were recognized as a fact that by the very logic and life of the principles we hold, we were forced to attempt the application of the truths taught by Christ, not only to our individual lives, but to all the problems of our time. It is easy for any one to see what a vast field lies before us, and before the whole church, in this continuous application of Christianity to the ever-changing conditions of human life, and to the shifting forms of error which oppose the advancement of the kingdom of God. There is no truer test of the principles of any religious body than its capacity to make this continuous adjustment in harmony with its principles, and while keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.

Some Friendly Baptist Criticism.

Through a mutual friend—Dr. J. H. Troy, of this city—a copy of the Editor's recent book fell into the hands of Rev. W. B. Harrell, a venerable and highly-esteemed Baptist minister of North Carolina, who, having read the book, has sent a review of the same to Dr. Troy, who has forwarded it to us. We are glad to give place to this friendly criticism in another place, because it is always helpful to look at any subject from another man's point of view who sees it in a different light. We are sure from what we have heard of Brother Harrell that no amount of theological difference would prevent us from recognizing in him a brother in Christ, whom we should delight to know better. We here invite attention to his criticisms of the work in the order he has mentioned them, not so much to vindicate the book against criticism—for we are not sensitive to adverse criticism—as to treat with proper respect the opinions of one whose age, ability and Christian standing entitle his utterances to respectful consideration.

1. The first criticism of the book is that in mentioning the means which lead to faith, the "author has omitted the very important and absolutely essential instrumentality of the Holy Spirit." If that be so, it were a "grievous fault." But it would be strange if it were so, for the author believes, with Mr. Campbell, that any conversion that is not "begun, carried on and completed by the Holy Spirit," is of little worth. We fear our brother had forgotten the chapter on the Holy Spirit, in which his work, both in conversion and sanctification, is emphasized. It is more probable, however, that our venerable critic separates the work of the Holy Spirit, as the author does not, from that splendid series of facts, truths and events which make up what we call the gospel. We conceive of the Holy Spirit as working through all these for man's enlightenment, conviction of sin and sanctification, but would place no limitation upon his methods, save that they do not dishonor God or ignore man's nature. God "draws" men to Christ by the revelation of Himself in Christ, and the Father gives to Christ all who respond to the influence of this divine magnet. We must not separate the Spirit's work from this supreme revelation of God in Christ, though we may well believe that the Holy Spirit has an important mission in bringing this revelation to bear on the understanding, conscience and will of men.

2. We have no difficulty in finding room for the statements quoted from Paul, in the view given above. But we regard the Arminian and Calvinistic theories as back numbers, which have served their time and should cease to trouble and divide believers. We all believe now that "whom God foreknew, he also foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son," and that "whom he foreordained, them he also called; and whom he called, he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified;" but we also believe that the method which God has foreordained for calling, justifying and glorifying men is revealed in the gospel, and that it does not ignore or override man's free will, nor coerce him to accept a salvation against his own judgment and voluntary choice. The author of "Helps to Faith" does not make the "mistake," as his critic suggests, of making "the whole matter of the soul's salvation, transformation, etc., to be effected by what he calls 'the laws that govern man's nature,' leaving nothing for the Holy Spirit." That would be superficial work indeed. Brother Harrell does not discern the vast difference between man's salvation being effected "by the laws of human nature," and according to, or in harmony with, the laws of human nature. Scientists have sometimes made this shallow "mistake," declaring that the universe is governed "by law." The fact is, law governs nothing. It is only a method of government. It is God that governs the universe, but He governs it according to certain laws. So we believe man's spiritual renewal is effected by divine power acting in harmony with the law of man's being.

3. Touching the matter of retribution, our brother inadvertently does the author of "Helps to Faith" injustice. He says, "On the question of future punishment we gather that the author . . . does not hold the scriptural doctrine of the eternal doom of the wicked in the world to come." Again he says, "It is evident that the author of the book in review believes that God does never 'close the door of hope' to any who die impenitent." He might have quoted from this very chapter where the author says: "But the supreme danger lies in so hardening the heart by repeated refusals to accept the gospel, that neither here nor there will repentance unto salvation be possible. Therefore those who promise salvation beyond death to those who refuse it in this world, go beyond what is revealed." The author's aim in this chapter was to remove the element of arbitrariness from the doctrine of future punishment, and show that it rests on eternal principles of causation and justice. He does not believe in the salvation of the impenitent, and does not feel authorized to say that all men will repent here or hereafter.

It is not a matter of importance whether the Disciples, in the latitude of our friendly critic, hold the foregoing view of punishment, or not. The beauty of our position is, they do not have to hold that view in order to be in good standing, nor does the author of the book have to agree with them in order to remain in their fellowship. It is a matter of opinion about which each is permitted to hold his own view and must not seek to make it a test of fellowship.

We thank Brother Harrell for his frank and fraternal criticism of the book in question, and assure him that we regard him none the less, but all the more, a brother in the Lord, for the liberty he has exercised in expressing his convictions in our columns. May the time speedily come when no barriers shall separate two peoples who seek to be loyal to Christ and to the Bible as do Baptists and Disciples of Christ.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Among the experiences which Paul records was "a night and a day . . . in the deep." This was no doubt in connection with one of his three shipwrecks. All day to-day, from 8 A. M. to 6 P. M., have we been on the bay, in a small sailing craft, with the exception of two hours from 11 to 1, when we were landed at "Bear's Cut," one of the natural channels which pierce Key Biscayne, and connect the ocean proper with the bay. The party consisted of Dr. John Gifford, late Professor of Forestry in Cornell, his wife, and her cousin, Miss Adams, from New Haven, Conn., Mrs. Haden, our hostess, and the Editor and his wife, besides the young captain of the "Sandow"—our sailing vessel—Clarence Hobbs, a boy of sixteen, but wise for his years in the art of sailing, and strong and courageous as an old "salt." "Bear's Cut" is only five or six miles across the bay as the crow flies, though part of the way our vessel had to thread its way through the channel, between sandbars, which it did successfully, by the aid of a government chart of the bay in the hands of Dr. Gifford. We landed on the north shore of the "Bear's Cut" channel on what is known as "Virginia Key," on a beautiful beach, where we remained long enough to take a swim, gather some shells and other curiosities, and to partake of a bountiful lunch. This "Virginia Key" is the one to be pierced by the government's appropriation for a new channel to connect Miami with deep water, but near its northern end, and near what is known as "Norris' Cut," which it was the original intention to deepen. Later surveys have resulted in the decision to dig a new channel through the Key to the ocean.

One reason why we did not tarry longer at the "Cut" was that the wind was blowing a stiffer breeze and had veered around so as to become a contrary wind. So fierce was the gale at one time that it was proposed to reef the sails, but the wind abated slightly and it was not done. We were five hours in "tacking" across the bay to the Haden dock. It was not only an adverse wind but a variable wind, now from this point of the compass, and now from that. Sometimes the ladies of the party became a little anxious when the waves were a little more tumultuous than usual, but as we neared the western shore of the bay the waters became calmer, and the wind died down until we wished for more rather than for less breeze. During most of the circuitous voyage, the "Easy Chair" was in the stern of the boat, and the editor held one end of a long trolling line, at the other end of which was a large hook baited with a white rag! Two fine groupers were the reward of this patience, and the hungry party appreciated them very much for supper. A half mile from shore the wind left the sails and we were compelled to substitute what the sailors call an "ash breeze," in the use of which muscular force is the moving factor. Before resorting to this method of locomotion we had dispatched Dr. Gifford, son of a sea-captain and himself a sailor of no mean attainments, with two of the ladies, and the two fish in a small sail boat we had in tow to go on ahead and have supper ready. At six o'clock, when twilight was thickening to darkness, we disembarked from the "Sandow." Supper was ready for us, and—we were ready for the supper!

One who has an eye for seeing spiritual law in the natural world, as well as natural law in the spiritual world, will be sure to get a good many suggestions from a day's experience in a sailing vessel. It is not always practicable to reach your destination by the shortest route. When this is impossible the sensible thing is to use tact and tack. Use the wind in taking your vessel as near the direction you wish to go as is possible, going different directions at different times, if so be by so doing you can reach your destination. If one can use an adverse set of circumstances so as to make them help him to achieve his purpose in life, he has learned the true art of living. One is often compelled to "tack" in accomplishing some cherished and worthy object in life. That white rag as a bait reminded us of some of the baits which the devil uses to catch men. At first we were skeptical about fish being caught with a piece of white cloth. We gave them credit for more sagacity. But the white bit of cloth was so placed so as to conceal the hook. The adversary of men frequently adopts the same method. We have heard of some people who would bite at the bare hook! We have never run across any fish quite that stupid. Preachers who succeed as "fishers of men" do not resort to the white rag species of bait. The gospel offers genuine and substantial inducement for men to become Christians. Again: at the end of life's voyage, even though our way has been circuitous, if it has been true to a steadfast purpose to be right, there will be safe anchorage, a hearty welcome, a royal feast, and rest.

And so, with writing, an occasional sail, an almost daily trip in row-boat to the post office, and overseeing a little work of clearing up our patch of ground on the bay front, the days pass swiftly by, and we shall soon turn our faces northward, visiting a few places on our way home. We regret to miss the Chicago Congress, but the transition from Bay Biscayne to Lake Michigan in March would be rather sudden. We are sure it will be characterized by the same freedom of discussion, open-mindedness to truth and fraternal feeling which have marked each of its predecessors. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST urged the usefulness of such an annual meeting years before it was established, and its history has more than justified our expectations. We have very kind invitations from J. P. Rowleson, of Tampa, C. E. Hill, of Mobile, and J. N. Jessup, of Little Rock, to visit their respective cities en route, and hope to take in the first mentioned, possibly the second, but not the Arkansas capital. The record of bright, sunny days and genial sunshine remains unbroken, down here on the Biscayne, though we have had some refreshing showers. We read with wonder of cold blizzards, even in Missouri, while we are basking in June weather. J. B. Corwine is not at Ocala, as we supposed, but at Athens, Ga., where he is preaching for the little flock of Disciples there, concerning whom he writes us in terms of affection already. He is only filling a temporary engagement there. Happy the church in the Southland that secures him.

Notes and Comments.

We reprint elsewhere from the Washington Post, an interesting review, Power's Life of W. K. Pendleton. The book is prized by this editor, not simply for the excellent biography of Mr. Pendleton, but because it furnishes "much biographical matter in the memoirs of Alexander Campbell, one of the most remarkable men America ever produced." This Washington editor thinks it "singular that so little is known of this great man who played an important part as an agent of progress and civilization in the then rustic and unlettered Middle West." This is "singular," but it has come about mainly from the fact that the religious history of the nineteenth century, in this country has been written mainly by men in the East who have not known nor appreciated the men and movements of the West, or South. Even such a late work as Dr. Josiah Strong's "Next Great Awakening," while giving large space to Dr. Bushnell, Jonathan Edwards, and others of less note, as men who exerted wide religious influence in this country, knows nothing, or at least says nothing of Alexander Campbell and Barton W. Stone, whose work has profoundly influenced the religious thought and life of America. But it will not always be so. The world will yet know and honor these heroes of faith.

The testimony of President Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders, before the Senate Committee, on the Smoot case, is throwing a lurid light on that gross superstition, religious oligarchy and sensual system known as Mormonism. It is humiliating to know that such a mixture of ignorance, bigotry and defiance of law exists and even prospers in this country, and yet it is well that the American people should know the facts. This much good, at least, the Smoot trial has accomplished. Imagine the boldness of an "apostle," and proposed successor to the presidency, who affirms his purpose to continue his polygamous practice though he knows it to be in violation of the law of the land, of the church, and the law of God! It is only justice to say that the branch of Mormonism known as the "Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints" repudiates polygamy, and such testimony as is furnished the Senate Committee by the Utah "Saints." But they both spring from a common false root—the Mormon Bible as an alleged revelation to Joseph Smith. That which is founded on falsehood, cannot live in the light.

The political campaign now in progress in Missouri, between the local leaders of the dominant party in the State, is, so far as our observation extends, without parallel or precedent in the history of the State. An amount of corruption has been unearthed in in the political life of the State that has brought the blush of shame to all public spirited, honest citizens of the State. The man who has been chiefly instrumental in bringing all this bribery and graft to public light and in prosecuting the criminals, is assailed by leaders in his own party, and his party loyalty is questioned! His opponents claim that the purification of the political life in the State is not an issue, in the pending gubernatorial election, while the man who has made it an issue is denounced as an enemy of his party! If the people of Missouri allow themselves to be "fooled" in this campaign when the issue is so plain, we will deserve the reputation which such a course will be sure to bring to the State.

W. E. Garrison, who has for four years been assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, has resigned that position to accept the presidency of Butler College, Indianapolis, and at the special request of the retiring president, Dr. Scot Butler, will assume the duties of the office at the beginning of the next term, April 1. The vacancy thus created in the staff of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST will be ably filled by Mr. Paul Moore, who was for several years managing editor of the Christian Commonwealth, London, England, and has for some months been with the Christian Century.

Questions and Answers.

Q If Christians can go on the battlefield and fight, why can't they fight as individuals?
J. A. S.

A. They can; and sometimes they ought. For example, a Christian who sees a ruffian attacking a woman is a poor Christian if he does not fight to compel the scoundrel to desist. If the good Samaritan had passed along the Jericho road a few hours earlier and found the robbers just beginning the assault upon their victim, he would have shown his goodness by helping to fight them off. When such a case arises on a larger scale, a nation may be called upon to play the good Samaritan and an army may become the instrument of righteous conflict. A Christian has a right to serve in such an army. Whatever one may think about the propriety of fighting in self-defense, no one can question the right of Christians to fight, if necessary, in defense of the down-trodden and oppressed.

Q. 1. What is to be inferred from 1 Cor. 15:29? Is there any record of the early church practicing baptism for the dead? Do Catholics place undue stress upon that Scripture for some of their practices, such as praying souls out of purgatory?

2. Is there anything known of what the Corinthians asked Paul in the letter which he mentions in 1 Cor. 7:1, more than what we can infer from his answer in this seventh chapter?
A. W. S.

A. 1. The meaning of "baptism for the dead" has been much disputed. There is no other allusion to it in the records of the early church. It has generally been assumed that the Corinthians, by reason of their imperfect instruction, had adopted the practice of vicarious baptism on behalf of their friends who had died in heathenism. If this is the case, Paul refers to it here not by way of commending the practice, but to show that it really implied a belief in the resurrection, though some at Corinth were denying the resurrection. It seems scarcely credible, however, that such a practice would not have been rebuked by the apostle somewhere in the course of the epistle. It is quite possible that the text is corrupt and that it should justify some such translation as this: "Why are ye baptized in the likeness of burial and resurrection from the dead?"

2. It is supposed that Paul's Judaizing enemies had already been at Corinth and that their teaching included elements of asceticism, such as the forbidding of marriage. In the chapter referred to, Paul is refuting this teaching and showing that marriage is an honorable estate.

Cause & Cure of Ministerial Despondency

By E. L. Ely.

In the good old days when it was generally believed that the powers of nature were used as God's avengers, John Wesley decreed that all his preachers should preach once each year on earthquakes—their cause and cure. Just what effect this had on earthquakes does not appear, but at least it was a great theme. In discussing the cause and cure of ministerial despondency, I am not sanguine as to the results in lessening the amount of ministerial "blues," yet I am of the opinion that it is both a great and a practical subject.

Every consideration—our own present happiness and fruitfulness, our possible fruit-bearing in later years when many are compelled to retire from active service, the direct connection between the mental and spiritual condition of the pastor and that of his people, as well as the honoring of God by our abiding faith,—all make it of the utmost importance that we, as ministers, keep ourselves cheerful.

Without doubt, the prime cause of ministerial despondency is congregational lethargy, and the case of a minister who would persist in his pessimism with a good, live congregation facing him must indeed be chronic. As a principal cause may be the lethargy of the congregation, so an almost certain cure would be a thoroughly live and enthusiastic one. But to keep up one's courage and to be cheerful and hopeful in spite of the conditions in the congregation, is the problem that confronts a large proportion of us.

The minister has mistaken his calling who has not such a profound sense of the importance of his work and the world's infinite need of the salvation which he is proclaiming, that the continued indifference to it will not at times almost overwhelm him with disappointment and sadness. With a pathos, making it almost like a cry of despair, our Lord looked on the city he loved so well and said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem," etc.; and again to his own people in tones of intense sadness he said, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." To be like him, then, we must have our times of extreme travail of soul when our hearts are filled with sorrow as we see men and women turning away from the truth.

But, too, our Lord could look at the approaching end of his life in calm assurance, because, notwithstanding the apparently small results, he was able to say, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." So it was the consciousness of work well and faithfully done, rather than visible results, that was the secret of his serenity.

In seeking out the causes of despondency in the preachers themselves, we shall doubtless find them as various as human temperaments, and perhaps they may be classified as physical, mental and spiritual.

Undoubtedly one of the chief sources of our periods of depression is an unhealthy physical condition. We are learning that the connection between the soul and the body is much more intimate than we have supposed. A great preacher said, "I have literally waded with a friend for months through the swelling river, and battled with the waves of despondency that were breaking over him, yet, knowing that he was a noble Christian, I did not lose my faith either in him or in God, because his disease was of the liver, and he saw things through a jaundiced eye."

Manual exercise, including systematic breathing exercises, would do much to brighten us up and make the world look brighter to us.

In regard to mental causes, an important cause may be found in the natural temperament. It is not an uncommon thing to see people in whom a condition of melancholia seems to be perfectly natural, and even conversion does not seem to entirely change that temperament. There are others who seem to be born with such a sanguine temperament, that to be joyful and hopeful seems to be as natural as for the lark to sing its way into the mid heavens. Happy is the man who can say with Emerson,

"Under the mud and scum of things,
There always, always something sings."

I am convinced that a great deal of ministerial discouragement is the direct result of habits formed as they grow into middle life of using preparation which was made in earlier years. With the repetition of old sermons they lose much of the enthusiasm which may have accompanied its first use. This is ministerial laziness. The insurance man, the physician, and the lawyer, have to be hustlers or despondency is their certain fate; and there is no reason why the preacher should not be under the same constraint.

A somewhat frequent cause for ministerial despondency may be found in the unfortunate habit of over-sensitiveness to petty criticism.

The minister must remember also that his opinions are not always to be accepted by the church; and if he has a reasonably good and efficient official board and they sometimes overrule his judgment in matters in which they are as much interested as he, this is not a matter to become downcast over.

Then he may be over-sensitive in regard to a seeming lack of attention to his comfort and convenience on the part of his people, forgetting that they have their own troubles and affairs to take their attention. Most of us have had experience in the raising of children, and we can remember the grand march at midnight in trying to soothe the little one to slumber, and coming to the conclusion sometimes that there wasn't anything really the matter with the baby, he just wanted to be carried. Possibly sometimes the preacher gets in that frame of mind when if the truth were known all he wants is to be carried by some of the sympathetic brethren or sisters. An invitation out to dinner or a few words of meaningless flattery seem to have a wonderful effect on his spirits.

But after all the greatest cause of ministerial despondency is undoubtedly lack of faith in God and of soul communion. Ministers are human and have their times of spiritual depression when the great realities of our religion have not the power over them that they had at other times; and I believe that most instances of despondency are caused by not having kept their hearts open to the sweet influences of the spirit of God. If we could always live in that frame of mind of Job when he said, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him," or of the psalmist when he said, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me. Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him who is the health of my countenance and my God," we should also be glad so that none of these things move us. Mr. Moody said, "God has no use for a discouraged man." Looking at Elijah under the juniper tree is like a look into the mirror for us, and God's way of infusing new courage into him and starting him over again on a useful career, may be taken as his method with us if we will let him have his way. First he recruited his physical strength then he was in a condition to listen to God as he reasons with him. Then by use of the moods of nature, God makes him to see his own tumultuous, unreasoning condition of heart. It was then he learned that these voices were not the voices of God; but like the quiet undertone of the storm, so God speaks in the still small voice a message to his inmost heart. God tells him that life is for doing—not for complaining, that there is plenty of encouragement if not in the largeness of things done yet in the things to be done and in the consciousness of infinite power to do in the name of God. Elijah had misunderstood the true success. He had thought it to be in the shouts and tumult of Mt. Carmel and this had died out and left him apparently alone. We need to learn that not always crowded houses or applauding audiences are the true sources of contentment and proofs of our approval by the Master. Somewhere there are, no doubt, the faithful few whose spiritual guide and inspiration we have been, and some time they will rise up and bless us and reward our fidelity.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

The Religious Education Association.

The vision from the dome last week reached to the City of Brotherly Love where the Religious Education Association was holding a session of three days. It was the second annual meeting, the first being held in Chicago, Feb. 10-12, 1903. The organization was effected by representatives of practically all religious bodies and educational institutions, and has enrolled over 2,000 members the first year. Its purpose is "to promote religious and moral education by the co-operation of workers for the studying of problems, for furnishing information, for mutual encouragement, and for the promotion of higher ideals and better methods."

The meeting in Philadelphia was a great one—great in its program and in its attendance, and, no doubt, will be in its results. The Public Ledger says: "The application to religious education of the modern results of pedagogical practice and research in secular lines, which is one of the chief objects toward which the association seems to be working, is a logical and much-needed reform, and the difficulties in the way are such as to impart to the present gathering great significance and importance." Never has Philadelphia seen a larger number of leading religious teachers within her gates. More than two-score of presidents of universities, colleges, or theological seminaries figured on the program of the thirty-odd sessions and a hundred or more of distinguished laymen. Evidently this body even in its youth has taken a firm hold upon the higher ethical and religious thought of the country.

The topic for the first day was: "What should constitute a scientific basis for religious and moral education, and to what extent does such a basis exist?" On this theme there were interesting shades of opinion. Dr. Gulick of New York, discussed it from the standpoint of educational practice, making some valuable inferences as to the character of Sunday-school instruction from the impressions of a number of business men as to the teaching they had received when boys, in respect to the subject matter, teacher, duration of teaching, personality of the class, and duration of the class relations. The modern world, he said, was "intellect-mad." "Intellectual instruction is of tremendous importance, but a greater point is to see that the characters of the teachers in our schools are such as we should want to see duplicated in our children." Prof. Tracy of Toronto, treated the subject from the view-point of ethics. With psychology, ethical philosophy, metaphysical philosophy and theology, Biblical theology and Christian experience, holding to the unity of man's life—the intellectual, moral, and religious—and finding as we do, that any other theory than that of the spiritual kinship of God and man is insufficient to account for the facts, we have, he thinks, a very genuine, though as yet not a very thoroughly understood scientific basis for religious and moral education.

Prof. Shailer Mathews of Chicago, whose paper was read in his absence, declared for Bible teaching based largely upon the fruits of "higher criticism." "The entire Bible material is to be approached through the history from which it sprang and for which it was intended. The thoughtful Christian will never again accept the doctrine of an absolutely inerrant book, whose every word, if not every letter, was divinely dictated. The growing mind should not be led to believe that any approach to such a view is demanded of it. One of the most serious injuries which can be done the child is to ground him in a set of religious convictions which must be abandoned rather than developed in his later life. All the theological reconstruction of the present is virtually an attempt to free theological thought from the traditional doctrine of inspiration which involved the accuracy and the permanent authority of every portion of the Bible." "At the same time," said Prof. Mathews, "it would be a serious mistake to shut the Bible out from religious and moral instruction. The Bible is something more than the doctrine of inspiration, and its inspiration is something far more real than a theory of a schoolman. No religious instruction can be satisfactory that ignores the Bible." Prof. Mathews thought the time has come for "a cautious and conciliatory use of the results of the higher criticism in the instruction of the young." Prof. Rhoades asked what in the Bible was to be accepted and what rejected? who was to decide? And declared his unwillingness to trust Prof. Mathews or the Chicago University to do it.

"The Bible in religious experience" was the next theme. Prof. Thomas C. Hall of Union, Bishop MacKay-Smith, and Dr. Judson of New York, were the speakers. They dwelt upon the value of the old-fashioned standards of Christianity, and held that the province of the Association was to revitalize old truths and not to set up new standards. Dr. Sanders of Yale as president delivered the annual address and said, in view of both friendly and hostile fears for the Religious Education Association, it seemed advisable to make three assertions:

"First. Our membership is already so large and varied that the organization is truly democratic and representative. It is bringing together for mutual stimulus and information all types of alert, responsive minds. There is little danger of professionalism.

"Second. The association is not a strongly centralized corporation so much as a federation of seventeen distinct and fairly independent departments of activity, each responsible for the adequate promotion of religious education within a field peculiarly its own, and managed by a committee or representative experts.

"Third. The association has exactly fulfilled its pledges of a year ago that its policy would be conservative and helpful. Its work is not iconoclastic, its methods are not polemical; its mission is to arouse available but latent interest, to educate and encourage it, and by specialized channels to set it to work in the world.

"It has been a year of complete organization of the study of working methods, of the collection of useful memoranda, of quiet experiment, of the beginnings of publication for the information of members, of the beginning of various lines of careful investigation. It has already become an organization of adaptableness and power. Its possibilities are yet unreachd. Not even this great convention will show our strength. An instrumentality has come into being which will stand in years to come for spiritual progress."

The second day began with the discussion of "Religious Education in the Home," when Dr. Landrith, the General Secretary, was heard, and a number of other speakers. Divorce, popular literature, club women, the public school, home-making, and kindred questions received vigorous handling. Thursday afternoon thirteen departmental sessions were held, each with a superb bill of fare. Universities and colleges, theological seminaries, churches and pastors, Sunday-schools, secondary public schools, elementary public schools, teacher training, Christian Associations, Young People's Societies, the home, the press, correspondence instruction, and religious art and music constituted the several departments. These held sessions also on Friday afternoon. Many of the ablest men in the nation read papers in these sessions. As they represented all schools high and low, conservative and radical, Jew and Dunker, the presentation of truth was many-sided. It was like the old Hartford Congress of Churches, or the Parliament of Religions. Burris A. Jenkins and W. D. McClintock were among the speakers.

"The Bible in Education" was the general theme in the second general session on Thursday evening. The addresses were strong, especially that of President Faunce of Brown on "The Co-ordination of the Bible with Other Subjects of Study." Prof. Dawson of Hartford declared: "The existence of the church and Sunday-school depends on whether they will get themselves adjusted to the facts and principles of modern science." President Faunce said: "Both church and Sunday-school are on trial as never before. Other institutions are rapidly growing up to discharge the functions necessary for human salvation that the Sunday-school and church have failed to discharge. The eternal God does not care what set of men or what institutions do this work, providing

The Bible School Ideal

By H. D. Williams

One of the great hindrances to the Bible school is the lack of any ideal worthy the name. The average church has its school just in obedience to the conventional way of doing things, but has no definite ideal for the school. The popular conception is that the school is a sort of sentimental effort of goody-goody people to teach some very indefinite, untangible and ethereal things, harmless but of little or no real value in the struggle of life. Nine-tenths of the church tacitly endorse this conception by an indifferent, don't-care attitude towards the school. They prefer to read the Sunday paper or some recent novel, to entertain company or visit a friend, to cast up accounts in business or plan for a new business, to visit the Sunday resort or inspect the property at home, to lie in bed till noon or saunter all day,—these things they prefer rather than to fling themselves into the work of the Bible school. Five days in the week John and Mary must go to the public school. They must be on time. They must have their lessons. They must study hard, burning the midnight oil, receiving the aid of parents, and having the advantage of many books. They must finish the course and graduate. Life will be a failure otherwise.

On the other hand, John and Mary may go to the Bible school or they may stay at home. It would be well for them to go if all things are convenient, but it is not of supreme importance. If company comes let the school be neglected, but not the company. John and Mary are permitted to follow the bent of their own feelings about the Bible school. They may go or not go, be regular or irregular, study or not study, progress or not progress.

Not only do parents permit themselves and their children to manifest such shameful indifference to the Bible school, but the school itself permits it and encourages it. The boy who goes late and irregularly and never knows his lessons and who disturbs the order of the school and hinders the work of his class is promoted year after year alongside the boy who is a conscientious, well-behaved student. Thus, in contrast with the public schools, the Bible school is only a plaything with no definite aim, no definite plans, no definite course, and no definite results.

There are those who affirm that this indefinite character is a condition necessary to the real spiritual work of the school. They say that when the school is run on business principles and sets up intellectual standards, then its spiritual aims are obscured.

That is on a level with the view yet prevalent in some ignorant communities that taking an offering lowers the spiritual tone of a church service. It implies that knowledge of the Bible—beyond a mere acquaintance with incidents—is not conducive to conversion.

In the place of this present indefinite play-school, there should come a very definite working institution conducted in a manner commensurate with the vast importance of its undertaking and compelling the respect of all men. But before the better school can come the higher ideal of the school must come to the church. That ideal, as study of the case has led me to see, should possess the following points:

1. The Bible school should be the entire church at work learning and teaching the Word of God. Confession and baptism should be considered as pledges to the Bible school work which is the supreme 'work' of the church. Confession and baptism mean a consecration to the advancement of the divine kingdom or they mean nothing, and the chief agency for the advancement of that kingdom is the teaching of God's Word.

2. The Bible school should not be thought of as an institution separate from the church. It is of right the church. Teaching is as sacred as preaching. Invitations to accept Christ should be given in the school and many confessions should be heard. All the respect and reverence accorded the church as a mighty, sublime, and divine institution, should also be given to the Bible school. When this is done by the church it will soon be done by the world, and a great advance will be made.

3. The Bible school should have a definite curriculum extending from the simplest Bible incidents for children up to a comprehensive grasp of Revelation and its great doctrines. This course, thoroughly completed, should give a full grasp of divine truth and human duty. It should be most tactfully and scientifically arranged to inform the mind, impress the heart, and shape the life.

4. The Bible school should be graded to suit the graded course. Honest and telling work should be done. Examinations should occur and grades should be given. Promotions should be made and diplomas granted. The pupils should be enabled to see that they are making substantial, intellectual progress.

5. The officers and teachers should be a body of earnest and devoted people, enthusiastic, self-sacrificing, well qualified in both head and heart, showing clearly by their work that the Bible school is of supreme importance.

6. The Bible school should have a building provided with a room for every class, and every room equipped with books, maps and other things necessary to the best of teaching.

Do you pronounce all this utopian? Josiah Strong says this age is guilty of three great sins,—having no ideal, having a low ideal, or having a high ideal and calling it utopian.

This high ideal of the Bible school is practical, and he who will get up on some mountain where he can take a wide view of the Bible school world and see what it is doing, will readily perceive that the above ideal points only in the direction of present tendencies.

The Bible.

By Simpson Ely.

The Bible is one volume; but it contains sixty-six books. It is a complete theological library. A theology not found in it should be discarded.

There are thirty-nine books in the Old Testament and twenty-seven in the New.

The Bible was made for three dispensations—the Patriarchal, Jewish and Christian.

Some one has called these three periods the Starlight, Moonlight and Sunlight ages of the world. We are in the glorious Sunlight Age. That which was written for us must not be confounded with the parts which were intended for Patriarchs and Jews. We are Christians not Jews. We are under Christ, not Moses.

The Bible was written by about forty authors. These writers were far removed from one another by time and space; so that a collusion among them was impossible.

There is wondrous variety in the literary style of the Bible. Some is plain story, some is prosy legal style, some is highly poetical, and it abounds in figures such as parable, metaphor, simile, hyperbole, and allegory. It has variety sufficient to gratify the most exacting.

The Bible is God's complete revelation to man, and we are warned against making any additions or subtractions. The Bible reveals the only perfect Life—that of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Men have tried to overthrow the Bible; but it is folly. It can't be done. It is like the Irishman's fence. He built it six feet high and six feet thick! When asked why he built it so thick he said, "Faith, if it blows over, it will come up as high as it was before!"

From the days of Julian until now, men have predicted the destruction of the Bible; but it is better understood now than ever before; it exerts a greater influence over the nations than at any previous time.

The grey dawn of a most beautiful day is upon us. God is back of his Word. It is mighty and must prevail. Truth must triumph over error and superstition. The nations of the earth must become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ.

Soul Prosperity

BY JAMES C. CREEL.

"The elder unto Gaius the beloved, whom I love in truth. Beloved, I pray that in all things thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as the soul prospereth. For I rejoiced greatly, when brethren came and bare witness unto thy truth, even as thou walkest in truth. Greater joy have I none than this, to hear of my children walking in the truth" (3 John 1-4.)

It is conceded by all, except perhaps a few disquieted ones, that there is great material prosperity among the people in this fair country of ours. This great prosperity has not come to us through any political party, any more than the rain, the sunshine, the favorable season and the fertile soil, have come through the administration of some political party. This abundant prosperity has come to us from God through the industry of the people, the seasons and the great fertility of the soil. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights" (James 1:17).

In having an abundance of material prosperity it is well to inquire, What about soul prosperity? Is spiritual prosperity among all the brethren anything like their great material prosperity? How about this, dear brother in the Lord? Does your eternal soul prosper richly in all spiritual and heavenly things? As your pocketbook grows larger does your soul grow bigger and larger in "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control?"

It is quite dangerous, some times, to real soul-growth, to have great material prosperity. Paul truly says: "But they that are minded to be rich, fall into a temptation and a snare, and many foolish and hurtful lusts such as drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil; which some reaching after have been led astray from the faith, and have pierced themselves through with many sorrows" (1 Tim. 6:9, 10).

John, "the elder," or the aged apostle, prayed that the beloved Gaius, perhaps one of his spiritual children, might prosper "in all things," material things, "even as thy soul prospereth." Here then, the apostle prays that the material prosperity of Gaius may be commensurate with his soul prosperity. How poor would some professed Christians be to-day in worldly things, if their material prosperity was no greater than their soul prosperity! They would indeed be poor in worldly goods; for their money purses would be as slim as Pharaoh's seven lean kine! What splendid soul growth would many Christians have if their soul prosperity was in equal proportion to the growth and expansion of their purse strings! But alas! with many of us when our pocketbooks begin to grow fat and big, our souls begin to grow poor and little; for often pocketbook expansion means soul contraction to many professed Christians.

In the past five years of the great prosperity in all our country, the writer can call to mind at this writing only one instance in which one of the brethren increased his subscription to the church because of his material prosperity. This brother stated to the church treasurer, "Well, we are having prosperous times, and I am worth more than I was a year since, and you may increase my subscription from twelve dollars to eighteen dollars."

There are, no doubt, many other such instances, but this is the only one that has come under the observation of the writer. Somehow pocketbook expansion does not often lead to soul expansion or soul prosperity. Perhaps many of us could not pray the prayer for ourselves that the apostle prayed for Gaius, for if we did the Lord might cut short our bread and butter in order to answer the prayer.

As there are means by which material prosperity may be attained, so there are means, divine means, by which great soul prosperity may be attained. The greatest possible means of soul prosperity, according to the aged John, is truth; the divine spiritual truth, the truth, as it is in Jesus who is the author, or embodiment, of all divine truth. The soul prosperity of the beloved Gaius appears to be the direct result of his walking in truth, or as the apostle puts it, "Even as thou walkest in the truth." The apostle then adds, "Greater joy have I none than this, to hear of my children walking in the truth."

Soul prosperity means growth of soul, freedom of soul, elevation of soul, satisfaction of soul, purity of soul. The divinely appointed means for the accomplishment of all this prosperity of soul is "the truth." As the truth is reflected through Jesus upon the soul, the soul grows, is made free, is elevated, is sanctified, is made pure, just to the extent that the truth is believed and obeyed, or as one walks in the truth.

Truth in the soul, believed and obeyed, produces growth of soul in the likeness of God; it drives out ignorance, selfishness and prejudice, and gives freedom from these things. Hence Jesus says, "The truth shall make you free" (John 8:32). Truth in the soul, believed and obeyed, elevates the soul to a higher plain of thought and action. Therefore the apostle says, "If then ye were raised together with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth" (Col. 3:1, 2). Truth in the soul, believed and obeyed, leads to the sanctification and purification of soul. Jesus said in his intercessory prayer, "Sanctify them in the truth; thy word is truth" (John 17:17). Peter says, "Seeing ye have purified your souls in your obedience to the truth" (1 Peter 1:22). John uses it all up in these words, "But if we walk in the light [obey the truth], as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin" (John 1:7).

Now then, since the truth is the divine means, God's appointed means, to produce the growth of soul, freedom of soul, the elevation of soul, the sanctification of soul, the purification of soul, it certainly follows that "the truth," apprehended and obeyed, is the divine means of all real soul prosperity. Therefore, let us all feed our poor souls upon the spiritual food, "the truth," and then we will have great prosperity of soul, which is far more important than all material prosperity.

FOOD'S WORK

How It Cured Paralysis.

Paralysis comes from weak nerves and bad blood and is often cured nowadays by proper feeding.

"For fifteen years I was an invalid, haven't walked a step for over twelve years, not able to move my feet or even my toes."

"But recently a wonderful thing has happened, for I had never expected to have the use of my limbs again; a four months' diet of Grape-Nuts Food for breakfast and supper, made the change and now just think of it I can move my toes freely on my left foot and a little on the right foot, and can let the foot piece on my chair down and swing my feet vigorously, which I think is a wonderful improvement for the time I have used the food."

"And that is not all! My blood and my stomach are so much better I am confident my trouble came from too much rich food and an overstrain of the nerves, but my nerves are much better, my mind is clearer and I don't forget things like I did. It must be the food for I stopped taking medicine years ago for the paralysis."

"Of course I have the sympathy and prayers of many Christians, but it is wonderful what good pure food will do for one out of health, and why would it not be as good to keep one's health up? I have heard lots of others praise Grape-Nuts, but I for one cannot praise it enough." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich.

Here was a well defined case of paralysis which came from weakened nerves and blood trouble, and which began yielding almost immediately when proper food Grape-Nuts was substituted for improper food. There's a reason.

Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The road to Wellville."

Human Invertebrates

BY BRUCE BROWN

Nature intended that man should walk erect and to this end equipped him with a spinal column. Unnumbered thousands bid defiance to Nature's laws and crawl in the dust and slime. The highest of God's creation is the only animal that fails to fulfill his mission. Man is the only rebel in the universe. I have seen a man cause a lion to crouch in fear and wind venomous serpents around his breast who was not strong enough to overcome his own passions. Some seem to find it easier to tame rattlesnakes than to conquer the snakish dispositions in their own breasts.

In golden times a man was made a knight by the touch of a king's sword, and a nobleman was one who had inherited vast estates and a noble name. We have come to a higher and better conception when knighthood and manhood are synonymous terms. A modern nobleman is the one who works with a brave heart, toiling upward toward the morning. It pays to be perpendicular in any profession. Even a saloon keeper or a preacher should be a gentleman. If he can't do that he had better quit his business. A modern gentleman is a gentle man with nerves of steel.

The social invertebrate has become the pest of the state. Without push or principle to make a place for themselves, hundreds of thousands have become social leeches, sucking their living out of the hard earnings of others. An army of office-seekers and speak-easies, of tramps and dead-beats, of gamblers and confidence men, of promoters and boomers, of beggars and peddlers are abroad in the land seeking to live from the fruits of others' labors. The world owes no man a living unless he earns it, but thousands of human parasites infest and infect the body politic. The crying need of the times is not more men but more manhood.

There are many invertebrates among the politicians. Many an office holder finds it impossible to be true to his constituency, for in making pledges he bartered away his principles. "I'll make no pledges and I'll be bound by none", said Lincoln when he was promised the nomination for president if he would make certain pledges. Rugged politicians of the Andrew Jackson type are needed to-day as never before, but many seem to have been born with twine strings in their backs instead of spinal columns.

The curse of our great cities to-day is men without backbone, men who have to be pushed and coaxed to do their solemnly sworn duty. If big policemen are afraid to enforce the laws, if the mayor or chief of police is afraid, let him swear in as special police a regiment of old battle-scarred, grey-haired veterans of the civil war and tell them to close up the law-defying places of sin and it will be done. He will find that men whose backs were stiffened at Chickamauga and Gettysburg are not afraid to enforce the law and uphold the constitution in Chicago or any other great city. "There would be something doing" if we could get men with spinal columns in places of public trust in our great cities.

But the theological invertebrate! The man with a custom-made religion, hemmed and stitched, who must not look toward the light and who dare not speak the message that is in his heart lest he lose his position! What shall be said of him? The minister with a God-given message to deliver who allows himself to be bridled and harnessed and wearily plods the circle around the treadmill his fathers made, deserves our sincerest pity. He may at times, while others sleep, catch a glimpse of the star-fretted dome of the new heavens and lands beyond the untravelled seas, but on the morrow he must go back to the battered pole at the crack of his Master's whip. The preacher of a great truth, born beyond the skies must not speak with trembling lips nor a palsied tongue.

Ministerial Preparatory Schools.

Z. T. Sweeney.

I have just finished reading H. D. Williams' article calling attention to Brother Sniff's letter, and I am constrained to "second the motion." I have read Brother Sniff's article very carefully and have handed it to several other brethren to read who are not subscribers to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I believe it touches a vital point in the future of the Disciples. We need to discover more preachers or rather aid them to self-discovery. The demand for good, efficient and earnest preachers, who are willing to begin in a humble way, is stronger than ever before in our history,—and is probably weaker now than it will be again for years to come.

I shall not attempt to review Brother Sniff's article; it speaks for itself. I have watched closely his work and the work of his college for years, and though not supported by the Brotherhood in any financial way, it is doing almost as much as any school among us to send out thoroughly equipped preachers.

I wish all the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to obtain the issue for March 3, and read Brother Sniff's article carefully. He knows whereof he writes, and it will do you all good to read it a number of times.

Unity and Missions.

The following is an extract from a letter written by a Salina, Kan., man who went out to the mission field in Korea three or four years ago. God is answering the prayer of his son. It behooves us to gird ourselves and exert every energy if we do not wish to be outrun in the race for a re-united church.

The meetings of our own American Presbyterian Mission North and of the Presbyterian Council, composed of all the missionaries of the four Presbyterian Boards at work in Korea, met in Pyeng Yang. We are planning to have just one Presbyterian church in Korea, and so the Council of Presbyterian Missions was formed to direct the united Korean church. I devoutly wish that it were possible to make the union embrace not only the different Presbyterian denominations, but all the evangelistic churches at work in Korea. I consider it not only a waste of strength but a grievous mistake to divide the infant Korean church and stamp upon it the denominational differences which we have at home in the matter of creeds and especially in the forms of worship. Why should we distract the simple faith of this people with our inherited theological feuds? One may know God without knowing either the Arminian or the Calvinistic arguments. It seems to me worse than folly to build up separate denominations with all their separate forms of worship, different hymn books, different forms of prayer, which cannot but estrange:

THIN DIET

No Nourishment In It.

It's not easy to keep up when coffee has so ruined the stomach that food won't digest.

A Mo. woman says: "I had been an invalid for two years from stomach trouble caused by coffee, got so bad I couldn't digest food and for quite a while I lived on milk and lime water—nothing but that—a glass of milk and lime water six times a day. In this way I managed to live but of course did not gain.

"It was about 5 months ago I began using Postum Food Coffee; I did not need the milk and lime water after that for I gained rapidly and can now eat a good meal and drink from 1 to 3 cups of Postum each meal and feel fine.

"I would not go back to coffee for any reasonable pay. I like Postum better than coffee now and make Postum by directions on box and it is just fine; never found a better way to make it than on box. Now this is all true and you can easily prove it." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum is a brew from field grains with all the nourishment left in. It makes red blood and rebuilds particularly well where coffee has done damage as it does to nearly all who drink it.

A 10 days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. There's a reason.

The Religious Education Association.

It was an important meeting, was that at Philadelphia from March 2-4. It drew the leading religious educators from all over America, some 500 men and a few women from nearly every state and Canada; presidents and deans of the leading colleges of the country from Harvard to Walla Walla, and from Toronto to Oklahoma were in attendance. It was the greatest aggregation of brains that I have ever seen.

And the best of it is that the object of the gathering was the promotion of religious education. It was a joy to see on the platform of Russell Conwell's church, at the closing session, the deans of four of the leading seminaries of the country, Harvard, Yale, Hartford and Union, viz., Peabody, Sanders, MacKenzie and Hall, respectively, and every one of them insisting with all his might that the Bible, and the Bible alone, was the main lacking element in public school, college and university education; and that the Bible and the Bible alone could solve the problems of social and national life. It was not doctrines that were needed, but the Bible; not criticism, but the Bible; not social panaceas, but the Bible; that was the element in our education that so far had been neglected.

This Religious Education Association is but a year old; but it is a lusty infant. Dr. Frank K. Sanders, of Yale, was its first president. Dr. Chas. Cuthbert Hall, of New York, has been chosen as its second. There is a Board of Directors, of which Bro. A. B. Philpott is a member. There are seventeen different departments, such as those of Colleges and Universities, Churches and Pastors, Sunday-schools, Christian Associations, Summer Assemblies, Young People's Societies, etc., in each of which there is an executive committee which seeks to advance Bible study in that particular field. A permanent staff of secretaries has been chosen, with Dr. Ira Landrith as their chief. He was lately editor of a religious journal of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Nashville, and is well known and well beloved by all who have worked in Christian Endeavor conventions. Permanent headquarters have been established at Chicago.

A budget of expenditures for the next year, aggregating $20,000, was set forth at this convention, $15,000 of which was provided for on the spot. And all this to promote Bible study. Surely the Disciples of Christ ought to lend their influence for furthering this end. It is directly in line with our plea. Membership in the association costs $3 and may be secured by addressing Dr. Landrith at 150 LaSalle St., Chicago. This entitles one to the volume containing all the addresses delivered at Philadelphia, which will be, as Dr. Sanders well said, the best and freshest statement of current religious thought ever made. Our people should have at least 500 members. There are now about 2,000 members of this year-old society.

Some of the most notable addresses were the following: Dr. Chas. Cuthbert Hall on "The Annual Survey of Progress in Religious and Moral Education." It was a masterly summing up of affairs in colleges, seminaries, public and private schools and in the home. Dr. Hall was not presenting his own thoughts but was, as he said, registering impressions from the enormous data he had collected by correspondence and through the departments of the association. While he was hopeful of the situation, while he felt the tremendous forces working for moral and religious growth in the country, he declared that these forces lacked unity, co-ordination, and needed a centralizing cohesion. Just what the Disciples have long held.

"The Contact of Biblical Material with the Experience of the Child," by Miss Josephine Baldwin, superintendent of Junior Work, New Jersey State Sunday-school Association, was one of the clearest cut productions ever made from a public platform, and shows the agility and analyzing power of woman's mind. She contended for the use of such materials as the child was prepared to receive, for closer

Peculiar To Itself

In what it is and what it does—containing the best blood-purifying, alterative and tonic substances and effecting the most radical and permanent cures of all humors and all eruptions, relieving weak, tired, languid feelings, and building up the whole system—is true only of Hood's Sarsaparilla

No other medicine acts like it; no other medicine has done so much real, substantial good, no other medicine has restored health and strength at so little cost.

"I was troubled with scrofula and came near losing my eyesight. For four months I could not see to do anything. After taking two bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla I could see to walk, and when I had taken eight bottles I could see as well as ever." SUSIE A. HAIRSTON, Withers, N. C.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

study of the problem as to what parts of the Bible were best adapted to certain ages in children; she seemed to believe that up to twelve years of age the New Testament stories were preferable to the Old, though she felt that this ought more fully to be investigated.

President Wm. H. P. Faunce, of Brown University, discussed "The Co-ordination of the Bible with Other Subjects of Study" in a forceful fashion, maintaining that all subjects are contributory to Bible study.

"The Art of Telling Bible Stories" was discussed by a master in that art, Richard G. Moulton. He insisted upon fidelity to the Bible itself, with imagination to illuminate it and with correctness of detail, and without moralizing and preaching. The Bible, everybody in the convention thought, is able to do its own preaching and point its own morals.

One of the most notable addresses was that of Dr. Walter L. Hervey, of New York, Examiner of the Board of Education, on "Memory Work in Character-Forming." He declared for large amounts of memorizing of the Scriptures by children; cited the case of Ruskin, who in his Praeterita ascribes the most valuable portion of his education to the memorizing of the Scriptures; and, like all the other speakers, Dr. Hervey insisted that the Bible, without comment or interpretation, should be read regularly, and even memorized, in the public schools.

Time would fail to tell of the first address of the convention by Dr. T. C. Hall, of New York—a worthy son of Dr. John Hall, of sainted memory, and a greater speaker than his father—on "The Unique Character and Value of the Bible as an Interpreter of Life;" of the deeply spiritual son of Adoniram Judson the missionary, Dr. Edward Judson, of New York, on the "Importance of the Bible as a Factor in Promoting Spiritual Efficiency and Growth;" and of the last speech of the convention by Dr. Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard, on the "Bible as Applied to Modern Social Life," a gem of English, a well of deep philosophy, a mirror of clear interpretation of Jesus's words, and a constellation of burning and illuminating pregnant sentences.

But a word can be given to the Department sessions. I saw only one department at its work, that of Colleges and Universities, whose sessions were held in the chapel of the University of Pennsylvania. Only the list of the four leading addressers of the two days can be given: "Chapel Worship," by President Richard H. Jesse, of Missouri University; "The Bible in the Curriculum," by Prof. Benjamin W. Bacon, of Yale; "The Broadening of Voluntary Religious Organizations of Students to Include all Types," by President Mary E. Woolley, of Mount Holyoke College, and, "The Pastoral Opportunity of the College Professor," by President Burriss A. Jenkins, Kentucky University.

The discussions proved often more valuable than the addresses, notably those of Dr. Peabody, Prof. Rice, of Wesleyan University, Conn., Prof. Henry Fowler, of Brown University, Prof. Hainess, of Swarthmore, President Warfield, of Lafayette, and Chancellor Kirkland, of Vanderbilt. As President Jesse said, the sauce proved better than the fish. The spirit of all these discussions was a call for more adequate moral and religious care of students and the due weight given to the Bible in collegiate instruction.

Some opposition, or rather distrust of the Association, has been manifested, but it seems rapidly to be melting away, and, I think, will invariably disappear when one comes into contact directly with it. Mr. Heintz, the beans-and-pickle millionaire, who is a devoted worker in the Pennsylvania State Sunday-School Association, came to the convention, he told me, with a chip on his shoulder, to find out what this new thing was. He said he had been afraid of it, but that now he was thoroughly converted, heartily in sympathy, and he gave $250 to its support.

John Wanamaker, who entertained the delegates at a reception in old Independence Hall, declared that night at the convention his hearty sympathy with its undertakings. And nobody will doubt John Wanamaker's sincere interest in conservative and constructive Sunday-school work.

To the Disciples of Missouri.

Our faithful corresponding secretary, Brother Abbott, has broken under the strain of our state work and we have ordered him away for a vacation. We trust that a few weeks' absolute rest may result in the complete restoration of his health. During his absence from the office such correspondence as can be answered by the office secretary and president of the board will receive prompt attention, but much of it must of necessity wait for the return of Brother Abbott. The board earnestly pleads with all the preachers and churches of Missouri to send their apportionments into the treasury without delay that our work may not be more seriously crippled by lack of funds. We do not believe that our brethren would willingly add to the burdens of their servants on the board nor to the anxiety that has so heavily weighed upon the heart of our faithful secretary. Make it possible for your board to welcome Brother Abbott's return with a full treasury, and the rest which we hope he will enjoy, will give him back to us full of his wonted vigor and hope.

W. F. RICHARDSON, Pres.,

In Behalf of the Board.

DIET AND DOCTORS.

That the value of diet in connection with medicine is fully appreciated by medical men as a preventive and aid in treatment of disease is daily evidenced by the call from the profession and from intelligent laymen for really hygienic foods. The popularity of the idea spread when the public realized that they could diet and yet not deprive themselves of palatable food.

Among the most delicious table delicacies obtainable are the cereal products of Farwell & Rhines, of Watertown, N. Y. The entire capacity of their mills is devoted to the production of health foods. Among these are Gluten Flour, for Dyspepsia; Special Diabetic Food for Diabetes; K. C. Whole Wheat Flour, for Constipation, while Gluten Grits and Barley Crystals are the most delicious of cereal breakfast foods.

Their pamphlet, giving full information regarding their various foods, together with samples of the same, will be sent free to anyone interested. Send for it. Physicians are specially invited to request samples for themselves or their patients.

News From Many Fields

Ohio Letter.

The church at New Philadelphia, led by C. B. Reynolds, is moving on to larger things constantly. The foreign offering was thoroughly worked up. A meeting was begun the second Sunday in March with Geo. Darsie, Jr. of Massillon, as preacher. That means the preaching will be well done.

Uhrichsville held a meeting with home forces entirely, and Pastor Allison welcomed 76 new members into the fold. This makes 453 he has received into this church in a seven years' pastorate. Do long pastorates pay?

The Ashtabula meeting resulted in 40 additions. Bro. M. Evers, of Painsville, did the preaching. The work at Painsville is doing well, and now has the largest Bible-school in the town.

Chas. Darsie, of Paulding, preached three weeks in a meeting at Wauseon, where 16 were obedient to the faith.

Mitchell E. Chatley is holding his own meeting at Ravenna with good success. Brother Chatley is well pleased with his new field.

Geo. A. Ragan, state evangelist, had about 40 added to the church at Marietta. He is now at Reno near Marietta in a meeting with good prospects.

W. T. Croom, of Bellefontaine, will assist the church at East Liberty in a meeting beginning about March 10.

H. H. Moninger, of Steubenville, is away from his post of duty for a few weeks, holding a meeting in Iowa City, Iowa. This is an exchange meeting with Percy Leach, pastor at Iowa City.

S. H. Bartlett, state secretary, a little more than filled the pulpit of C. A. Freer at Collinwood, while the latter was in the meeting at Unionport. Andrew Carnegie has offered the Collinwood Church $1,000 on a new pipe organ. There is not much doubt but that the gift will be accepted.

J. E. Strickler, senior elder of the Central Church in Columbus, died on Sunday night, March 6. Brother Strickler has long been identified with the church and also with the Central. He was deeply interested in the kingdom of God and will be greatly missed by that congregation and by his family.

Ohio has a bran new senator. General Chas. Dick is the man. He fills the short and long term of the late M. A. Hanna. Mr. Dick is a fine politician. Some of us think he is not a representative of the best statesmanship in Ohio, but possibly he will find many in the senate not his superior in this line.

A. O. Henry held a meeting at Bergholtz, and organized a church of 66 members. Three lots were bought in the center of the village, and a house will be built at once.

The legislature of Ohio has a mania for bad bills this year. The Chapman bill abolishing spring elections has passed the Senate. But there is such a storm of protests from all places and people that it will likely be defeated in the house. A bill has also been introduced by a Cuyahoga Co. representative, legalizing gambling at race tracks. This is occasioned by Mayor Coff, of Glenville, prohibiting pool selling at the Cleveland races last fall. Will the good people of Ohio sit idly by and see such an iniquitous bill passed? Poke your representative under the rib with a vigorous protest.

This scribe has been in the hills of southern Ohio for 19 days in a meeting at Unionport. There has been a deep interest and several additions. It has been a delight to be in fellowship with A. M. Hurd, an old college classmate. The companionship otherwise has also been delightful. While here, Mr. Redbreast came back for the summer with his fine song. He got here two days sooner than a year ago. Mr. Crow also came. With the great hills and the birds and the hospitable farmer-homes and tables fit for a king who would not be happy? All it lacked of being ideal was the good wife at home and the rollicking bairns. Then too I have had excellent companionship within doors. I have sat at the feet of H. L. Willett in "Basic Truths;" E. L. Powell in "Savonarola;" Benjamin Kidd in "Social Evolution;" and for variety, Aylsworth's Moral Aspects of Baptism has been partly re-read. These books are all worthy of a careful reading, and can be had from the Christian Publishing Co., of St. Louis. O yes, I almost forgot to say I have taken a few subscriptions to the best religious paper published, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. God bless Unionport and her noble people.

C. A. FREER.
Collinwood, Ohio.

Missouri's Capital.

Our revival with Arthur N. Lindsey, of New Franklin, Mo., as evangelist, closed recently with 49 additions. At the end of the fifth week Brother Lindsey was forced to leave to meet an engagement at Higginsville. Up to that time there were 34 added to the church. We continued one week longer with home forces only and added 15 more, making a total of 49. One came from the Methodists, one from the Catholics, one from the New Lights, three from the Baptists, 18 by statement and letter and 25 by confession and baptism. Considering the uniformly bad weather and other unfavorable circumstances it was a good meeting.

When I came here a year and a half ago the church had 125 members. Since then we have added 140 new members.

Our Bible school recently made a new record of 160 in attendance. Our superintendent, Charlton B. Corwin, and his family are soon to leave us. This is a serious loss.

The Junior Endeavor now numbers nearly a hundred, the largest in its history.

We are slowly accumulating a building fund. Our greatest need is a larger and more modern house of worship and we must have it. It is a shame that the Disciples of Christ, the largest religious body in Missouri, have such a small and unsightly building in the capital city. There are a hundred reasons why we should have the best in the city. But we are weak numerically and weaker financially, and to build a house commensurate with our needs and the dignity and standing of the brotherhood we must have help from our more fortunate brethren throughout the state.

Who will help us?

Brethren, send us aid at once that we may erect a splendid church in this strategic city.

CRAYTON S. BROOKS.
Jefferson City, Mo.

Georgia Notes.

Georgia, the empire state of the south, has a population of 2,300,000, with about 13,000 Disciples. A company organized a society at Scull Shoals, near Athens, in 1807, and called themselves "Bible Christians." They insisted on the union of all God's people, and later came under the influence of B. W. Stone and were called "Stoneites," until the espousal of the views proclaimed by Campbell. The Disciples of Georgia were first called Christians at Antioch. Because of irrevocable submission to early denominational traditions and unspeakable religious prejudice, coupled with unequivocal dogmatic tenacity, our growth has been painfully small but vile misrepresentations are becoming quite unpopular, and the fraternal spirit increases all the time. The future grows brighter; the songs of victory are in the air. The silvery sheen of prosperity is visible on the crest of our ecclesiastical horizon.

W. J. Cocke, our efficient state evangelist with a master's hand, is skillfully guiding the work in the way of better methods and more effective organization. He is an able and eloquent champion of the "one plea."

The Southern Evangelist, under the able management of the worthy triumvirate, Shilnutt, Chastain and Adams, would be a credit to any state.

Light is spreading, truth is being disseminated, and knowledge is increasing. Our papers are potent factors in the molding of character and creating public sentiment. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, the magnificent tribune of the people, representing the greatest cause under heaven, stands amid the heated fray like a great "stone wall," lending inspiration to those who bear the heat and burden of the day.

Christian Union is abroad in Atlanta. Dr. W. W. Landrum, pastor of the First Baptist Church, in an article to the Atlantic News, insisted that all the churches of that marvelous city should unite on a common Scriptural name, making Atlanta the first metropolitan city of Christendom—a veritable new Jerusalem on earth.

The work in Atlanta, under the supervision of S. B. Moore and R. Lin Cave, is moving grandly onward. Brother Moore contemplates building a magnificent church soon, after the order of a tabernacle.

The untimely death of A. B. Phillips, our "prince of preachers," has caused a vacancy at the First Church, Augusta.

Wm. Shaw will supply at Macon until April 1. After that date he will enter the field as Endeavor and Sunday-school evangelist. Brother Shaw is eminently qualified for this important work, since he worked for years in this capacity while a member of the Congregationalist.

Our work in Rome manifests new life. Sam Jones will be here in April at the big warehouse. We want to follow him, if possible, with a meeting by one of our leading evangelists.

Virginia.

A recent meeting held at Lynchburg by W. H. Book, of Martinsville, and F. F. Bullard, of the Lynchburg church, resulted in twenty accessions. During the meeting, Brother Book lectured to the students of Virginia Christian College each morning on the apostolic church. The lectures were well received. Brother Book has consented to be the chief speaker at Piedmont Assembly this year. This is the fourth time that Brother Book has done this important and arduous service.

The church at Harrisonburg, which was organized by V. C. M. S., has recently purchased a well located lot, which will be paid for by July 1. The work in this good county seat has taken on new life since the purchase, and the contract for a house will soon be let. The work here is supported by V. C. M. S. D. S. Henkel is the wide-awake, energetic minister.

Our financial secretary recently made a short visit to Portsmouth, Va. In Portsmouth and vicinity fifty one Disciples were found. The V. C. M. S. has planned for a great meeting at Portsmouth in July or August. A good church will no doubt be organized.

The meeting at 30th Street Church, Newport News, did not result as had been hoped. The chief hindrance was the very inclement weather. W. F. Smith has done a good work in this field. P. A. Cave was the evangelist.

Geo. Owen has resigned his work and will, we are informed, return to Illinois, in order to enter college and finish his course. He has done a real good work and endeared himself to his people.

R. H. Jones, of North Carolina, will take the work in the Blackstone field. There are now 26 members at Blackstone, but no organization. A meeting will be held by W. H. Book in May, when an organization will be effected.

J. J. Haley will address the special meeting at Virginia Polytechnic Institute on March 27. This service is held in the college auditorium, and all the students—700—are to attend in a body, the churches of the town call in their services, and all attend the college service. It is a great day, and we have the speaker this year.

C. O. Woodward will be the evangelist in the Fredericksburg meeting in May. A great meeting is expected. Wm. Phillips is the efficient pastor. The Sunday-school has recently doubled in attendance, and all parts of the work are manifesting new life.

The V. C. M. S. is planning for its greatest year. Every church that has made an offering up to the present time has surpassed the offering of last year. It is hoped that this record will be kept up.

The Sunday-school offering for state missions is to be taken in April this year. Already the sounds of preparations are heard. All Virginia is now busy about her foreign mission offering. Everything else is side-tracked.

O. A. Hawkins, of Seventh Street Church, Richmond, has been recently elected president of the Y. M. C. A. of Richmond. This organization has 1,200 members and expends annually some $10,000. Our churches furnish three directors, O. A. Hawkins, F. T. Sutton and E. N. Newman.

We had scarcely grown accustomed to this honor to our brethren before the announcement was made that Prof. C. W. Kent, of the University of Virginia, who is a member of the church of Christ at Charlottesville, was elected state president of the Y. M. C. A. of Virginia. These are well deserved compliments to brethren of sterling worth.

H. C. COMBS, Fin. Sec. V. C. M. S.

Entertainment at the Congress.

All who desire entertainment (lodging and breakfast) provided during the three days of the Congress in Chicago should send their names to Errett Gates, University of Chicago. The committee will not hold itself responsible for assignment to free entertainment unless this previous notice is given. Let all who expect to attend the Congress take notice.

New York City.

The pastors, and their assistants, of our churches in Greater New York and vicinity organized last February as a Ministerial Association, with the following officers: B. O. Denham, Pres., S. T. Willis, Vice-Pres., Colby D. Hall, Sec. and Treas.

The first regular meeting, since organization, was held Monday, March 7th, at which time Mr. and Mrs. B. O. Denham entertained the Association at luncheon at their home, 2197 Broadway, New York City. Bro. M. L. Bates, Pastor at East Orange, N. J., gave a brief but masterly talk on "Our Plea: Its Bible Basis, Its Hindrances, Its Prospects." The talk was freely discussed by all present.

Reports from the six congregations represented were most encouraging. Sterling Place, Brooklyn, M. E. Harlan, pastor, Colby D. Hall, assistant, reports six additions since Jan. 1, audiences growing and the Sunday-school averaging 140 in attendance. Church is harmonious and progressive. Evangelistic services will be held early in April.

Greenpoint, or Second Church, Brooklyn, Jos. Keevil, pastor, reported seven additions since Jan. 1, growing audiences, spirit of unity and work. Sunday-school attendance averages 185. Deficit of $140 paid since Jan. 1. Bro. Keevil is a new man with us, but is splendidly winning his way. He publishes a weekly church paper, just established.

East Orange, N. J., M. L. Bates, pastor, reports growing audiences, harmonious spirit throughout the church, seven additions since Jan. 1, and a Sunday-school average attendance of 145. Bro. Bates is also a new man in this field. He has won his way to the front already.

Second Church (169th St.) New York, S. T. Willis, pastor, R. D. McCoy, assistant, Report: full house, growing audiences, eight additions since Jan. 1, average Sunday-school attendance (two schools) 350. This congregation recently dedicated the first story of a new building, which it occupies, greatly enlarging its opportunities for effective work. The church is engaged in an effort to raise $1,700 to meet amounts due on account of this building enterprise. They richly deserve success.

Lenox Avenue (119th St.) New York, J. P. Lichtenberger, pastor, Frank Garrett, assistant. Sunday-school averages 220. Twenty additions to church since Jan. 1, during which time John G. Slater, of Ohio, assisted in a two weeks' meeting. Foreign missionary offering of March 6 was double that of last year. Sunday-school will make Easter Sunday a "decision day."

First Church (56th St.) New York, B. O. Denham, pastor, S. G. Inman, assistant. Largest morning audiences in years. C. W. B. M. recently added seventeen new members and the Y. P. S. C. E. has added about the same number of new members since Jan. 1. Sunday-school averages (two schools) 225. Seven additions to the church since Jan. 1. Largest missionary offering recently in years. Church progressive and united.

The Disciples' Union met on March 8th at Lenox Avenue Church, with Stephen J. Corey, Corresponding Secretary of the State Missionary Society, as speaker. The address was one of the best the Union has heard. April meeting to be at First Church (56th St.) with H. O. Breeden, of Iowa, as speaker.

HOW TO FIND OUT.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it, or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

What To Do.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy, fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy, and a book that tells all about it, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address, Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing be sure to mention that you read this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y. on every bottle.

Wisconsin Notes.

Bro. C. M. Kreidler has just closed a good meeting with his own church, Milwaukee, with home forces. There were 29 additions, mostly conversions. A. E. Wrentmore, of Chandler, Oklahoma, has just closed a meeting at Sugar Grove with 19 additions: 17 baptisms and two otherwise. We had hoped that he would remain with us, but coming in the winter as he did, the climate proved too severe and he was compelled to return to the south. Milton Wells, of Footville, a short time after his meeting, visited Sugar Grove and immersed two more.

Brother Wells held a short meeting at Sabin resulting in nine additions. He is now wanted at Readstown nearby.

Wiley Cash closed his work at Richland Center March 1. The work has prospered under his leadership. The church is looking for a good man to take his place. A man that is a good pastor is needed. Martintown has employed R. G. Sears, of Madison, for one-fourth time. He will hold a two weeks' meeting at Werley, one of his appointments this month.

Jamie Howe, the grandson of Henry Howe, the man who established many of our Wisconsin churches, departs this week for Eureka, where he will enter college to prepare himself for the ministry. Our church will greatly miss him and his estimable wife, but our prayers go with them, and it is hoped that some day they may return to this most needy field. We have taken up the Norwegian work in our state and employ Julius Stone, of Chipewa Falls, for all of his time. He has the general supervision of the work; any questions in regard to it will be promptly answered by him. Let us do some foreign missionary work at home. Will not our churches rally to his support? Brethren, this should be the work of all, and we must have your support if we make this successful. Let all of our churches remember that the second quarterly payment for state work is due March 1 and remit to D. N. Wetzel, Footville. We secured last year an offering from every church. We must do the same this year and increase the amount. D. N. WETZEL.

REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT: And Jesus went about Galilee teaching, preaching and healing.—Matt. 4:23.

The lessons of the past quarter have covered the early life and about half of the public ministry of Christ. The material included within these limits may be summarized under the following outline:

- I. Annunciations, birth and infancy.
- II. Thirty years of private life.
  1. Visit to Jerusalem (Lesson 1.)
  2. Life at Nazareth.
- III. Introduction to ministry.
  1. Preaching of John the Baptist. (Lesson 2.)
  2. Baptism of Jesus.
  3. The temptation. (Lesson 3.)
- IV. Early Judean ministry (recorded only in John 2:13 to 3:36, not in synoptic gospels.)
- V. Galilean ministry. First period, from the beginning of preaching in Galilee until the calling of the Twelve. (Lessons 4 to 8.)
- VI. Galilean ministry. Second period, from the calling of the Twelve until the retirement into the north. (Lessons 9 to 12.)

Early Life.

The wonderful personality and Messianic mission of Jesus were foreshadowed in his birth and in the events immediately preceding and following it. These should be briefly reviewed, although the lessons for the quarter do not touch upon them. Jesus was not simply a man whose superior wisdom enabled Him to become a teacher of religion, but He was a unique personality sent into the world for a special work, and His extraordinary character was indicated in His birth as well as in the events of His later life. The visit to Jerusalem at the age of twelve shows Him coming to the consciousness of His mission—probably not yet a full understanding of it, but at the very least a firm conviction that He was in the world to work the works of God. Such a thought as this was in no way incompatible with the intellectual immaturity of boyhood. Even ordinary children of that age are quite capable of deeply religious impressions and convictions. They should not be forced into an expression of this in imitation of adult experiences, but should be allowed and encouraged to give to their religious conceptions and impulses such expression as is appropriate to childhood.

Introduction to Public Ministry.

The preaching of John the Baptist pointed both backward and forward: back to the prophets whose message of righteousness and repentance he repeated, and forward to the Coming One whose kingdom, about to be established, furnished the present necessity and inducement for repentance. The message of John was the message of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah, brought to focus and particularized in view of the immediate appearance of the Messiah and the establishment of the regime of righteousness to which these earlier prophets had all looked forward. The baptism of Jesus was His testimony of approval of this new order of things, and his temptation was a triumph over inadequate and false conceptions of the character of the kingdom, and the means by which it should be successfully established. The preliminaries are now over, and Jesus is ready to begin His real work, the preaching of the kingdom of God as a spiritual kingdom, the criterion for admission to which is not bodily descent from Abraham, but a right disposition of the heart working itself out in right living.

Jesus's Public Teaching.

After a brief visit to Galilee and a return to Judea, Jesus went again to Galilee where He began that course of preaching and teaching which occupied the greater part of His ministry. This Galilean ministry falls into three sections. In the first, Jesus directs His teaching entirely to the general public, the miscellaneous audiences which gathered about Him as He went from place to place. In the second, this general teaching was mingled with more specific instruction given to the chosen apostles. In the third, there was little else than the teaching and training of the Twelve.

In the first period (including lessons 4 to 8) the following points are to be noted: Jesus performed a large number of miracles, all of which were miracles of healing, and in this way became widely known and very popular among the common people. He preached and taught also, but was probably little understood. His old acquaintances at Nazareth rejected Him. He called to Himself four men who had been disciples of John and they became the nucleus of the Twelve. While the popularity of Jesus was constantly increasing on account of His wonderful works, there was the beginning of jealousy and hostility on the part of the scribes and pharisees, who criticized Him for presuming to forgive sins, that is, to heal souls as well as bodies, and for His apparent indifference to the requirements of the law, as indicated by His free use of the Sabbath.

The Public and the Twelve.

Seeing the need of preparing a group of men who could perpetuate His work after He was gone, Jesus called the Twelve and made them His constant companions. Henceforth He divided His time between a public ministry to the masses and private ministry to the Twelve, and it was not long until the apostles themselves were made ministers to the public. The Sermon on the Mount, immediately after the call to the Twelve, was a complete and comprehensive presentation of the principles of the kingdom of God, the requirements for admission to it and the blessings which were to be derived from it. This and the group of parables concerning the kingdom of God (Matt. 13:1-53) form the principle part of the teaching of Jesus during this period. There were miracles also, some of which, like the stilling of the storm, were intended for the strengthening of the faith of the Twelve; and some, like the feeding of the five thousand, were intended to embody religious ideas in a form which the public could understand.

By the end of this second period of the Galilean ministry, two conditions had come about which hampered the work of Jesus: first, the common people who thronged about Him to get the benefit of His miracles, persistently misunderstood their spiritual import; and second, the hostility of the scribes and Pharisees was an increasing menace. Both of these facts rendered a change of policy desirable, and henceforth withdrawing from the throng and paying little attention to popularity and hostility, Jesus devoted Himself to the training of the Twelve.

THE SIN OF INTEMPERANCE.— Prov. 23:29-35.

The Bible denounces all sin, not only because it defies God, being a violation of His law, but because it injures man, being also a violation of the law of his well-being. Intemperance, or indulgence in strong drink has large space, because it is especially dishonoring to God and destructive of man's body and spirit.

It multiplies human ills. Woe, sorrow, contentions, complaining, causeless wounds and redness of eyes, are set down as the peculiar possession of the intemperate—they that "tarry long at the wine," that "seek mixed wine." None of these things is esteemed desirable. They are all evils to be avoided, not blessings to be sought. But they grow as fruit on the tree of intemperance. Why cultivate a tree that bears such fruit? Why tolerate such a tree in the garden of one's life?

The remedy, or safe preventive. The Bible remedy is to go to the root of things. It is not, "Be careful not to indulge too freely in the intoxicating cup." It is far more radical than that. "Look not thou upon the wine, when it is red, when it sparkleth in the cup; when it goeth down smoothly." That is the safest attitude toward strong drink by the weak, and those who are peculiarly tempted by it, and it is the Christian attitude of all others who thereby give the influence of their example toward their brother's safety. (See Rom. 14:21.)

Reason for this extreme caution. "At the last it biteth like an asp and stingeth like an adder." This is the effect of strong drink "at last." If it had this effect at the first, there would be little need of this warning. But therein lies its danger. It produces exhilaration of feeling and good spirits at the first, but persisted in, it gains the upper hand of its victim and manifests its real character: it bites and stings like the deadly reptile. Its bites and stings, alas! are not confined to the body. It not only plants the seeds of disease in the body, but it attacks the spiritual nature of man—that which is highest and best in him. It leads to sloth, lasciviousness, adultery and crimes of almost every kind, because it inflames the passions, deadens the conscience and loosens the bonds of self-restraint. The whole history of crime is a confirmation of this indictment. And yet men tamper with it as a harmless thing! If the surviving victims of its bites and stings could pass before our eyes in procession it would be a sad but impressive object-lesson to the young.

Some of the marks of intemperance. "Thine eyes shall behold strange things, and thy heart shall utter perverse things." The repeated bites and stings of the serpent have now reached an extreme stage. O, the horrid visions of writhing and hissing serpents which come to the hardened drinker at the last. O! the foul and blasphemous utterances from the heart, which have been emptied of all its pure desires and aspirations and filled with all that is impure and loathsome, like a nest of unclean birds. No situation of shame, or of danger, now troubles the helpless victims. They will sleep on a railroad track, or go staggering into any place of danger, insensible to peril, oblivious to decency.

The chain of habit. When one has experienced the awful consequences mentioned above, does he, when he comes to himself, turn away with infinite loathing from that which has imbruted him and caused him to forfeit the confidence and respect of his neighbors and friends? On the contrary, he says, "I will seek it yet again." He is now the victim of his appetite, dragged along at the chariot-wheels of Satan to certain destruction. This is the condition of thousands in our country to-day, who start in life with fair prospects of usefulness and happiness.

To say that they can do nothing but fold their hands and look on while this venomous adder is stinging thousands into drunkard's graves every year, is to belie the potency of the gospel and the power of an awakened and enlightened public conscience. We must do something. Christians should let their influence be felt in the home, in the social life, and in our political life against the deadly evil and against all laws, usages and customs which lend sanction to the traffic in intoxicants. We cannot do less than this and be guiltless of our brother's blood.

Prayer: Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thou hast revealed Thy holy will against strong drink, and furnished us weapons in this warfare against intemperance and the saloon. We pray Thee to arouse Thy church, and all who love humanity, to make war against this common enemy, until our fair land and the whole world shall be freed from the disgrace of the drunkard and the licensed saloon. In the power of Christ's name we ask it. Amen!

JESUS' WORK FOR HIS OWN COUNTRY:
WHAT CAN I DO FOR MINE?
Matt. 4: 23-25; 23: 37.

For the Leader.

The noblest pages of the histories of all the nations are the pages upon which the historians have written what men have done for their own countries. The life of the patriot will ever fire the zeal of the growing youth. The lives of men who have left their own countries to help fight the battles of those who were contending for home and native land are the most precious of biographies. Jesus came to years in his own country. As He approached His baptism at the hands of John, He was then girding Himself for the most heroic struggle ever put forth by a nation of heroes. He came in the full purpose of a great work. That life of patriotism and holy crusade against all wrong was to be short. Yet it was to be matchless in its constancy, its sacrifices, its bounties, its mercy, its fervid preaching, its thorough work of evangelization. Jesus did for His own country the best work that could have been done for it by reproofing it of sin; by showing it the way of life; by giving Himself for it; by making it the base of supplies and operations for His world-wide campaign of evangelization. Let us see to night what we can do for our country.

For the Members.

1. By reproofing it of sin. The world has never known a more fearless preacher than Jesus. They said of His preaching and teaching, "Never man spake as this man." The logical deductions of the Pharisees had lost the charm of life. The quibbles of the Sadducees were lost in the commercialism and sensuality of the day. The time serving and trimming of the Herodians had then no more of moral vitality than the life of the modern politician. The Ascetic sects had taken to the caves and to the woods, and had thus by withdrawing from men, lost the opportunity to help them. How different was the program of preaching, and visitation, and heart-searching questioning, and terrific arraignment of sin, and work of healing the sick and helping the poor adopted by Jesus.

2. By showing it the way of life. His life was a demonstration of what He taught. "I am the way, the truth, and the life", He would say to the multitudes. That is, to put it from an unusual point of consideration, "If you want to know and understand what I am teaching you concerning what men should strive to live, look at My life. The way to live, the truth to believe and teach, the life to live—why, if anyone wonders about it, here it is embodied in Me. I am what I teach. The result of this new doctrine you hear? It is I."

3. By giving himself for it. Jesus gave himself for His country. All the earthly pleasures He might have enjoyed were given up that He might give himself wholly to His brethren. Houses, lands, even a regular boarding place—all were given up for the good He would do for His country. "The foxes have holes, the birds have nests, but the Son of Man has not where to lay His head." This was a sacrifice that was felt. Such sacrifices we should make for our country.

4. By making it the base of supplies for His world-wide campaign of evangelization. To the Jew first He came. He said to His disciples whom He was sending out the first time, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, but rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Repentance and remission of sins was to be preached everywhere, beginning at Jerusalem. They were told to tarry in Jerusalem for the promise. Then they went by the way of Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria, Antioch to the uttermost parts of the earth.

5. What can we do for our country? It is the fairest of all the countries. It is our native land. Here liberty reigns. Its beauty is marred only by sin. Can I do anything better than to make it the base of world-wide operations against sin? What will be better than to preach a gospel of grace and life in the name of the Master to all her people, expecting that they shall thus be prepared to take the lead in saving the nations that know Him not?

Kansas City Notes.

Kansas City is going nicely. Every church and mission in the city is going forward to greater things. Sheffield, under Bro. C. G. Jones, had a mortgage burning two weeks ago. Ivanhoe has Fred S. Nichols as pastor, and Budd Park has E. H. Williamson as pastor. These two are assistants to me as city evangelist. I still continue in the work with most of my time given to Jackson Avenue. Thirty added there this year at regular services. Am using extra chairs already. Bro. Alford closed a good meeting with Pastor Clinton Aber of the West Side, this city, and Bro. Spencer of Kentucky, closed one recently with 60 at First Church with Bro. Richardson. Bro. H. B. Wright, Forest Avenue, will begin April 1.

Bro. Williamson is now in a meeting, and I am holding one at Ivanhoe with thirteen added the first week. Miss Jennie Harris, blind singer of St. Louis, is assisting.

Bros. Fife, Haley, Morgan and Combs are moving along in good shape. South Prospect, under Bro. J. J. Morgan, have just frescoed their church. The outlook is bright and getting brighter. We now have eleven city pastors in Kansas City.

Our Budget

—The Cecil Street Church, Toronto, raised its full apportionment, $100, for foreign missions.

—I. N. Jordan of Walshville, Ill., paid the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a call on Thursday of last week.

—Missouri preachers should be sure to remember the lectureship which is to be held in Fulton, Mo., April 11-14.

—Wm. J. Howe of Richmond, Ind., died at Martinsville, Ind., Saturday, March 5, and was buried at his home on March 8.

—E. D. Long is preaching for the church at Angola, Ind., which is still without a regular pastor since C. S. Medbury went to Des Moines.

—Wallace C. Payne, of the Kansas University Bible chair, has been spending some weeks in Austin, Texas, giving Bible studies and lectures at the state university.

—Frank G. Tyrrell of St. Louis, will deliver his popular lecture on "Sleepyheads" at the First Christian Church, Chicago, on Thursday evening, March 24, the week of the Congress.

—Robert G. Frank writes that the church at Liberty, Mo., is on the honor roll with the churches giving more than their apportionment for Foreign Missions. $100 asked for, $110 raised.

—J. Cronen Berger, Pastor at Clarksville, Ga., wishes to correspond with brethren wishing to locate on cheap land in Northeastern Georgia where there is splendid climate, good land, fine scenery and good markets.

—Samuel Gregg has taken the pastorate at Corning, Iowa, and will begin a meeting March 13, in which Bro. Chas. McVey will have charge of the singing. Bro. McVey called at this office last week on his way to meet this engagement.

—J. T. Shreve recently supplied the pulpit at Valparaiso, Ind., in the absence of the pastor, J. H. O. Smith, who was in a meeting at Marion, Ind. Meanwhile, Mrs. Shreve occupied the pulpit at Oelwein, Iowa, where Brother Shreve is pastor.

—H. R. Ford, Pastor at Manor, Texas, writes that the church there is prospering as evidenced by the fact that they have exceeded their apportionment for Foreign Missions, raising $90 when only $75 was asked, and will probably make it $100.

—C. A. Hill, who was with his wife in a promising meeting at Roscoe, Kan., has had a severe attack of pneumonia, and will be unable to continue his work during the present month. All mail for the present should be addressed to him at Hill City, Kan.

—The church of Birmingham, Ala., of which A. R. Moore is pastor, has just completed a splendid building which will cost, including furniture, about $21,000. With this new equipment and the undiminished zeal of pastor and people our cause in the Pittsburgh of the south ought to go rapidly forward.

—The Christian Woman's Board of Missions has received a gift of $10,000 from Mrs. M. M. Blanks, Lockhart, Texas, for the establishment of Bible work in the State University of Texas. The gift has been in contemplation for several years, but was made to Prof. W. C. Payne during his stay in Austin.

—Sister Mary C. Douglas, of Missouri, who gave our National Benevolent Association an $1,800 annuity more than a year ago, has just given $500 more on the same plan. This is a commendation for the annuity method of giving entitled to the consideration of all contemplating helping our church enterprises.

—An unpublished picture of Alexander Campbell and wife has recently been discovered among the effects of Mrs. Enoch Hooton of Mexico, Mo., recently deceased. The picture is a daguerreotype and it was presented to the late Enoch Hooton in 1859 by Mr. Campbell, who held a protracted meeting in Mexico in that year.

—The local papers of Garnett, Kan., report that the work of Melancthon Moore, pastor of the Christian Church at that place, is producing large results in that community. Brother Moore has been unanimously called for his third year. The membership has been largely increased and more than $1,200 has been spent in improving the church building.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter G. Menzies and native evangelists, have recently made a tour of the Hanierpur District, India, and spoke the gospel message to 100,000 souls. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions has pre-empted this territory and established mission stations at Mahoba, Rath and Mauhda. From these centers the evangelization of the district is sought.

—Wm. J. Slater of Worden, Ill., was ordained to the Christian ministry at Litchfield, Ill., on Sunday, March 6. The sermon of the morning was preached by Bro. Slater and the ordination service was conducted by C. D. Purlee. Mr. Slater was a resident of Litchfield for several years, and was at one time connected with the staff of the Daily News of that city.

—The Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Institute will be held at Atlanta, Ill., April 12 and 13. The program includes some of the strongest men in the state, and there will be several lectures and sermons by I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky. The church at Atlanta is one of the best in central Illinois, and will take good care of all who attend the Institute. Full report will be published later.

—The investigation of the churches against Senator Smoot gives timely emphasis to the recently published annual report of the Utah Gospel Mission. This is an interdenominational evangelistic enterprise which has for its sole purpose the overthrow of Mormonism by the preaching of the gospel of Christ. The work is done through a secretary who delivers addresses on Mormonism and preachers, and colporteurs who distribute anti-mormon literature.

—W. Arthur Fite has resigned the pastorate of the church at Maryville, Mo. At the advice of the doctors, Brother Fite will take his wife to a milder climate to prevent threatened pulmonary trouble. It will be deeply regretted that Brother Fite's promising ministry with this splendid church has been cut off before there was opportunity for it fairly to fulfill its promise. He is one of our ablest young men, and his wife is of the greatest assistance in his ministerial work. We hope a warmer climate may have the desired effect upon her health.

—Some months ago, following up a suggestion which had come to us, we announced that a prize would be awarded to the person writing the best music for the poem entitled "What We Stand For." Although no definite time limit was placed upon the competition, we think all of our musicians have had ample opportunity to file their productions, and the manuscripts which have been received will be placed in the hands of the Fillmore Bros., who have kindly consented to act as judges. The manuscripts as placed in the hands of the judges will bear no mark by which their authorship may be indicated, so the verdict will be a perfectly impartial one. It is understood that in case the judges find none of the contributions of sufficient merit, they may render a verdict against them all.

—We have received a copy of the new Easter cantata prepared by Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds for the use of Junior Endeavor Societies and Mission Bands for their Easter entertainments. The cantata will be sent free in such quantities as are needed, by the Junior Department of the C. W. B. M. Address, 152 East Market St., Indianapolis. Miss Pounds, who has charge of this Department, says that the prospects for the general observation of the self-denial season and of the Easter service in the interest of the C. W. B. M. Junior are brighter than ever before. From the same office we have received a booklet entitled "Recitations and Dialogues for Missionary Entertainments." It is compiled by Miss Pounds and has sixty four pages of good, usable, missionary matter. It will be sent to any address for 15 cents.

The Disciples of Christ the Only Religious Body.

The Disciples of Christ is the only religious body who are erecting a building on the grounds of the World's Fair. It is located at a most excellent point, quite accessible to all and will present a creditable appearance. There will be ample space to present the work and teaching of the Disciples of Christ. Here the work of our colleges, our missionary societies and the literature of the brotherhood will be presented to the world. Here leaflets and tracts will be presented to those who need to know that there is at least one religious body in America who practice and teach only what is authorized and in perfect harmony with the word of God. For the purpose of erecting this building there has been raised:

E. D. Long will be at the University of Chicago after April doing some graduate work, and would like to preach for some church that can be reached from Chicago. Brother Long is a graduate of Hiram College, has been preaching for several years and can furnish strong testimonials as to his ability and character. Address him at Angola, Ind.

The address of E. L. Frazier is Marion, Ind., and of J. E. Hawes, Ada, O. Bros. Frazier and Hawes have recently joined forces for evangelistic work.

Any church in the vicinity of Kirksville, Mo., desiring a pastor for half or quarter time, can secure one by addressing Wm Mondy at that place.

Power's Life of Pendleton.

A Review from the "Washington Post."

A work of particular interest to Washingtonians for two reasons. First, the book is a history of the life of an eminent West Virginian, Rev. Wm. K. Pendleton, who was the first doctor of philosophy and afterward president of Bethany College, the oldest educational institution of the Disciples of Christ, which was established and built in 1840, at Bethany, a town sixteen miles north of Wheeling. The Pendletons are an old American family with connections scattered throughout the two Virginias, and in his capacity of president of Bethany College, President Pendleton became known to a large circle of people now residents of this city. Second, the book is written by Rev. F. D. Power, pastor of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church of this city, who stands well qualified for the task of writing the history of one of the foremost men of the Christian faith. At the outset the author gives an extended history of the Pendletons, both before and after their migration to Virginia, entering in detail upon the ancestry of the family and the part its members played in the colonial history of the Old Dominion. Following the history of the family down to 1817, he then takes up the career of William K. Pendleton, who was born in that year, the son of Col. Edmond Pendleton. The Pendletons were Episcopalians, but in 1834 Col. Edmond Pendleton and his wife made the acquaintance of Alexander Campbell, the founder of the Disciples of Christ denomination, to which doctrine he and his family became converts. After reviewing the life of Young William in the University of Virginia, he transfers the scene to the banks of the Ohio River. Young William K. Pendleton had in the meantime married Lavinia, the daughter of Alexander Campbell, and when the latter established this, the first college of the new faith, on the Ohio, above Wheeling, in 1840, W. K. Pendleton became its first doctor of philosophy. With this as a starting point, Rev. Mr. Power follows the history of the rise of this, the greatest Christian college in America, from a frame structure in what was then the western wilderness, down to the present day, the greater part of which work was accomplished through the efforts of Rev. Mr. Pendleton, who became its president some years after its establishment, continuing in office almost until the day of his death in September, 1899. One of the last acts of Rev. Mr. Pendleton's life was in January, 1884, when he preached the dedication sermon in the Vermont Avenue Christian Church.

The book is very far from being a prosaic history of the life of a great man. In the first place, it lets in a flood of light on the early history of Virginia during the days of Madison and Monroe; on the life at the University of Virginia of those days, as well as giving a most excellent word picture of early times in the Ohio Valley. Furthermore, the work gives (what is scarcely to be found elsewhere) much biographical matter in the "Memoirs of Alexander Campbell," one of the most remarkable men America ever produced. It is singular that so little is known of this great man, who played an important part as an agent of progress and civilization in the then rustic and unlettered middle west. Perhaps the most important feature of all is the account given in this book of the beginnings of missionary work and the upbuilding of the missionary service, not alone of the Christian Church, but of other denominations of early times. Although not generally known, it is none the less true that the Disciples of Christ probably did more to bring the missionary service up to its present status than any other Protestant church except the Moravian Brethren, the Methodists and the Quakers. Barring these three sects, the denominations of that day were not over active in the matter of missionary endeavor, and the efforts and success of the Disciples of Christ along the line of calling attention to the fact that what the country at that time needed was not so much the evangelization of the Fiji Islands as the carrying on of missionary work in our own great West, which was at that time filling up at an astounding rate with settlers who were without ministers, teachers, churches or Sunday-schools to keep them from relapsing into a condition bordering on barbarism. This need was early recognized and supplied by the Disciples of Christ, so that it is little wonder that they are nowadays one of the strongest sects in the states of Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas and Texas. The work contains a portrait of Alexander Campbell, the Wesley of the American West, the first ever published, as well as quaint old pictures of Bethany in the days when it was a group of small frame buildings in the western wilderness.—Washington Post.

An Open Letter.

DEAR BRO. ABBOTT: I wish to thank the State Missionary Society for the help you are giving St. Louis. We greatly appreciate the appropriation to our work here this year. It must not be forgotten, however, that the amounts thus far appropriated are wholly inadequate to do the work in this city. There are 1,000,000 of people in our city and a few counties around it. These counties immediately around it on the north, south and west, together with St. Louis, are mostly Catholic and German Lutheran. Here are 1,000,000, nearly one-third of the population of our state, which are socially and religiously wholly different from the rest of the state, and the twelve churches with a membership less than 4,000, is about all we have in them. First, then, your Board should do more for St. Louis because of weakness in such a large population. Second, more money should be spent here because this is one of the great cities of America and growing as rapidly as any city in the world. Third, it is a strategic city, the heart of the Mississippi valley and the heart of the nation. Fourth, while in the city of St. Louis and its surroundings in Missouri there are a million people among whom we are so very weak, just across the river in East St. Louis, Alton, Belleville and adjoining towns are 250,000 more people where our cause is almost wholly unknown, and yet many of our own brethren are moving in among this 1,250,000, and most of those coming are lost to us because of lack of churches. Only two churches among the 250,000 across the river, and they were organized by our mission forces from this side. We need more churches, and the State Board must come to our aid if we would hold and save our own, to organize these additional congregations. Fifth, your Board should largely increase their appropriation for our city because our brethren are liberal with your Board and every other missionary enterprise in the brotherhood. Last year our 3,823 members in this city gave $8,655.64 to our organized mission work and Benevolent Association. A membership so

Our Western Letter.

An event of more than local interest was the dedication of "Palmer Hall" in Colorado Springs, seventy-five miles south from Denver and at the foot of Pike's Peak. This is a building of Colorado College, devoted to science. It is called "Palmer Hall" in honor of Gen. W. J. Palmer, a citizen of Colorado Springs, who contributed the first $70,000 of the $300,000 expended in the erection and equipment of the building. The other large contributors to the fund were the late W. S. Stratton and George Foster Peabody. The dedication of "Palmer Hall" was a matter of more than local interest, as you will see from the names of distinguished gentlemen who participated, and of institutions represented in the exercises. David Starr Jordan, of the Leland Stanford Junior University, California, President Van Hise, of the University of Wisconsin, Prof. E. C. Moore, of Harvard University, Prof. Starr Willard Cutting, of the University of Chicago, Prof. L. A. Sherman, of the University of Nebraska, and many others of like celebrity and standing were present. President Harper, of the University of Chicago, and Chancellor E. Benjamin Andrews, of the University of Nebraska, were unable to attend in person, but sent worthy representatives.

At a banquet given at the Antlers Hotel 450 college and university men were present. Prof. Moore, of Harvard, said at this feast that he could not name a New England city or a middle state city of twice the size of Colorado Springs that could gather together so many college graduates with such a community of spirit. This is said to have been the most notable function ever held by a western college, and I am tempted to accept the statement as correct. Amherst College, Yale University, Wisconsin University, the University of Chicago, Harvard University, the University of Michigan, Oberlin College, the University of Nebraska, the University of Missouri, Cornell University, Williams College, Brown University, the University of Iowa, Princeton University, Dartmouth College, the University of Pennsylvania, Columbia University, the University of Virginia, etc., etc., were represented. The time and space at my disposal will not permit a full enumeration of the distinguished persons present and institutions represented on this occasion. I only desire to give a hint of the character of persons and the way things are done in the wild west!

Colorado College was founded in 1874 when Colorado was yet a territory of the United States Government. The movement began, as a matter of fact, in 1868, only seven years after the organization of the territory. It is the oldest college in the state.

Upon the occasion of my first visit to the Rocky Mountain region, the great northwest and the Pacific coast, I was impressed with the keen and apparently universal interest manifested in the cause of education. I am now prepared to say that all this vast country is in advance of the east in this regard. Nor do I wish to be understood by this remark as disparaging the east. Such is not the case. I only intend to emphasize the profound and general interest in the cause of education in this part of the world.

Some have indeed expressed a fear that this interest is so absorbing as to stand in the way of the church and its progress. I do not experience this fear. The church is making encouraging progress. The men who are laying foundations in this magnificent and majestic empire are very generally persons of approved Christian character. This part of our land will compare favorably with any other portion of our country in this respect.

Colorado College is a distinctively Christian institution. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," words uttered by the Founder of the Christian religion, is the inscription over the door of the the new science building, and was the text of the dedication sermon preached by Professor Moore, of Harvard. The first public announcement of Colorado College declared: "It is the purpose of the trustees to build a college in which liberal studies may be pursued under positive Christian influences. . . . The college is under no ecclesiastical or political control. Members of different churches are on its board of trustees. The character which is most desired for this college is that of thorough scholarship and fervent piety, and neither ever offered as a compensation for the defects of the other."

This work was inaugurated by the Congregationalists. Pres. W. F. Slocum is an accredited minister of the Congregational denomination. His predecessors in office were of the same body. Edward S. Parsons, the vice-president is also a Congregationalist. The First Congregational Church in Colorado Springs is popularly regarded as the college church. Dr. Joseph B. Clark in his interesting and instructive book, "The Leavening of the Nation," speaks of Colorado College in such a connection and manner as to leave the impression on the mind of the general reader that it is a Congregational school. Dr. James B. Gregg, pastor of the First Congregational Church in Colorado Springs, in an address delivered before "the State Association of Congregational Churches," in 1898 says that "in consequence of the founding of Colorado College at Colorado Springs, Congregationalism went southward into the Arkansas valley." The World Almanac for 1904 says that Colorado College is "non-sectarian." But it could easily be this and at the same time Congregational. A school or a church may be denominational without being sectarian. The specialty of the Congregational denomination, as all the world knows, is education. They acted wisely in the early founding and constant support of this institution. It not only sent Congregationalism into the Arkansas valley, but sent it all over the state.

The Congregationalists are, comparatively, strong in this Centennial state. You must remember that we have a population of not more than 600,000; Colorado is 370 miles long from east to west and 280 miles in extent from north to south. It has an area of 103,925 square miles. It is equal in the extent of its territory to New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware and New Jersey. Now in the midst of this sparsely settled state the Congregationalists have 93 churches, 178 Sunday-schools, 55 Societies of Christian Endeavor, 7,641 church members, 68 houses of worship, one educational institution and 84 ministers. To the American Board the Congregationalists in Colorado contributed last year $4,081, and to the Home Missionary Society $4,096. They expend on their mission work in Colorado $12,000 annually, and support, in whole or in part, 49 workers. Two new houses of worship were erected last year. The increase in the number of communicants last year was 799.

The first church of the Congregational order organized in Colorado was at Central City by the Rev. William Crawford in 1863. There were twenty-one charter members. Three were soon added to this number. Of the twenty-four members seventeen were men. In six months the church became self-supporting and raised its pastor's salary from $1,200 to $2,000. When his successor came he was promised $2,500. A church costing $11,000 was built three years later. A debt of $2,500 was paid in twenty minutes at the dedication. It is an interesting fact that Congregationalism in Colorado took care of itself for fifteen years before the Home Missionary Society assisted the work. This is a pretty good showing in the way of aggressive missionary work and of growth on the part of a people whose specialty is supposed to be education.

The numerical increase of Congregationalists in the United States during the last forty years has been considerable. In 1862 there were, for instance, 2,555 churches. In 1902 the number of churches was 5,753. In 1862 the number of communicants was 255,034. In 1902 the number was 645,994. In 1862 there were in the Sunday-schools 246,178. In 1902 there were 658,405 in the Sunday-schools. These statistics are for the United States. The increase in churches, communicants and Sunday-school pupils has not been great, but the progress has been steady, strong, wholesome.

Helps To Faith

By J. H. GARRISON

THIS volume is an effort to carry the argument in favor of Christianity further back than it is usually carried, so as to meet every man on his own ground where he is, and to lead him thence, step by step, to the acceptance of Jesus Christ as affording the only revelation of God and the only religion which can fully satisfy the needs of men. Beginning with the foundational fact of human nature itself, with its religious instincts and religious needs, it aims to lead the sincere and honest searcher for truth from fact to fact until the mind is prepared to receive the Christ of the Bible as the fulfillment of the prophecies of man's inner being—its intuitions, its capacities, its needs—as well as the fulfillment of the prophecies written by holy men of old.

The work consists of two parts. Part I consists of a series of reasons, of foundation facts which underlie faith, embracing eighteen chapters. Part II treats of Some Obstacles to Faith, embracing twelve chapters, the whole making a book of 245 pages.

It is the author's belief that it is a timely book, adapted to the religious needs of many, who, today, are disturbed in their inherited beliefs, and are seeking for some more substantial basis for their faith. It is his sincere hope, too, that the book will in some humble measure meet the wants of this class of people and serve to lead many a doubting soul into the light and joy and strength of a clearer and stronger faith.

The work is bound in blue silk cloth and sells at the popular price of $1.00.

As Seen From The Dome.

that the work be done. We can never return to the Puritan point of view in education. Our thoughts have widened. We can no longer regard the laws of Deuteronomy as binding on us or the morality of the Old Testament as complete. We no longer look to the Bible for our astronomy, geology, or even psychology. But because we believe that the word of the Bible is absolutely essential to the education of every human being, we ask for a close and constant co-ordination of Bible study with all the studies of the schools." He wished the Association might appoint a committee of representative men from various churches to compile a book of selections for use in the schools. It would be easy for Protestant, Catholic, Jew, and Agnostic to agree on certain historical and ethical selections. President Harper, Edward Everett Hale, Rabbi Hirsch, Felix Adler, and Archbishop Ireland could do it. If we may recount the wanderings of Ulysses, why not those of Abraham."

As to the teaching of the Bible in the public schools there were some strenuous utterances. Prof. Schaeffer, State Superintendent for Pennsylvania, declared: "I am in favor of ruling out of the public schools all teachers whose attitude toward religion is either hostile or indifferent." Prof. Morris of New York: "Our youth are required to know Homer and Cicero, yet of the Bible and its characters they are required to know nothing." Prof. Stetson of Maine, would have the young acquire a knowledge of Bible characters instead of the heroes of mythology with their oftentimes attendant histories of impurity. "Bring back the Bible to the school and God to civilization!" said Principal Bishop of Walnut Hills, Cincinnati. All through the Congress deliverances about creeds, and Old Testament authority sounded strangely like some sayings that came many years ago from the Bethany oracle.

The closing session had for its consideration "The Bible in Social and Civic Life." Prof. Peabody of Harvard, and Russell Conwell made leading addresses. They were strikingly dissimilar, yet powerful appeals for conformity to the Bible in social and civic life. The Harvard professor viewed the Bible from the modern standpoint, but still declared it the Book of Life. In contrast to his learned phrases and calm delivery was the passionate and characteristic talk of the Baptist pastor who, without preparation, but with homely similes and popular illustrations, caught his audience and held it. The Bible he thought to be the solution of all evil, of the negro question, of war, of differences between capital and labor, of every problem, social, industrial, national, and international. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, the new president, made the closing deliverance on "The Annual Survey of Progress in Religious and Moral Education." It was announced that the receipts the past year were $6,672 and $20,000 was needed for 1904. Mr. William Shaw of Boston, told his story about the city-bred preacher and his cow, and $5,000 flowed into the bucket as the result of his milking. The proceedings of this second meeting of the Religious Education Association will make an interesting volume.

Publishers' Notes.

Nearly all the lessons on the Life of Christ are taken from the synoptics, so that J. S. Lamar on Luke ($1.50), with McGarvey on Matthew and Mark will readily be used by those wanting the best in connection with our lessons.

J. W. McGarvey is always in demand for his pointed and terse way of teaching the truth, but is most helpful in his Matthew and Mark commentary, which sells for $1.50, and will be in use in the study of many of the lessons during these six months.

The demand for the Normal Instructor, in seven parts, at 15 cents each, continues; and why not if one wishes to have the best in connection with our studies in the Life of Christ? W. W. Dowling has no superior in such work. The various parts are clear, simple and pointed. $1.50 per doz.

Few men were better than B. A. Hinsdale as a teacher, and he did some of his best work in "Jesus as a Teacher" ($1.25), and it is especially appropriate in our present lessons, helping us often to look at the lesson just as the Master faced the issue in dealing with the people or problem.

The American Revised Bible by the Nelsons, is now in the Teacher's edition, and has concordance and helps needed in a Twentieth Century Bible. The prices run from $2.25 to $10, with the indexed at 35 cents additional. Every minister and all good teachers ought to use the American Standard edition of the Revised Bible.

There has come to us the opportunity to assist in introducing the Revised Version by offering the New Testament in nonpareil, limp cloth, red edges at seven cents; full cloth, red edge, at 15 cents; and in long primer, silk cloth, red edges, size of book, five by seven inches, at 35 cents. Think of that. These prices are postpaid, too.

That was a most fortunate idea of G. A. Hoffmann, "The Minister's Pastoral Memorandum and Records," as it so aptly meets the desires of so many of our ministers wanting a pocket record of the membership, list of officers, missionary societies, church committees, Bible-school officers and teachers, young people's societies, marriages performed, funerals preached, sermons delivered, subscriptions for church papers, and many other items which the busy minister needs recorded. Price only 50 cents, in splendid cloth binding.

The calls for Y. P. S. C. E. supplies in new quarters indicates the activity of our young people, at which all Christian people will rejoice. Missouri and Texas are in the lead, judging by what comes this way, and there is no telling what may be the results should the army of young Christians in the latter state once become thoroughly aroused.

The new book of Dr. W. T. Moore will soon go to the public, and will, without doubt, create much interest, as in it, the author discusses and advocates that the planets about us are inhabited. Dr. Moore's positions are always taken and defended with such interest as makes his books among the most popular, and we predict this one will be no exception.

Paul Castle has organized a class in Normal work at Chambersburg, Ill., which seems to be succeeding finely, if one can judge by the orders sent in for the Normal Instructor, part one. This could be done to great profit by many other ministers, and such work would be appreciated by many of the congregation as well as the Bible-school workers. Such work always tells for good in all departments of the church.

A Call to Young Men.

What are we going to do about it?

Recently I attended a lecture on "Genesis" by a learned professor who sold out the book of Genesis for a song, and threw in a large part of the New Testament for good measure. According to the lecturer "there never was an Abraham; there never was an Isaac; there never was a Jacob; there never was a Joseph;" and there may be some doubt about Moses himself. "We know," said the lecturer, "that all these were stories which were told at shrines in Israel and Judah, and were not written till the ninth century B. C., and some of them not until the fifth century B. C." Now the writer will confess that he entertains a pretty high opinion of modern scholarship in general, and of modern biblical scholarship in particular. He thinks that some of the results of modern historical criticism of the Bible are very beneficial, and he has no sympathy whatever with that wholesale denunciation of the Higher Critics with which we have become familiar and which we expect from certain quarters. Would that some of our good brethren might see how they are hurting the cause we all love by their short-sighted attacks on the scholarship of our day! But notwithstanding his regard for modern scholarship in general, the writer has no feeling but that of disgust for such dogmatism as that of the above mentioned professor. Their favorite phrase, "We know," takes the place of argument; their mere assertion is supposed to be accepted by an audience as the end of all controversy.

And it is just here that the sad part comes in. The mere assertions of these men are unwittingly accepted by many to their hurt. For, since they can neither refute the "scholarly" assertion nor adjust themselves to the "new light," they often make shipwreck of their faith.

Just before the lecture to which I have referred, a young lady said to me, "I am interested in these matters, but I have never studied the Hebrew literature; in fact, I know very little about the Bible." At the close of the lecture the same young lady exclaimed, "Wasn't that fine? I wish I could study under such a man!" Now this young lady represents a large class of people. They may be found in every community and in almost every church. And, if they read at all, they are constantly coming in contact with this destructive teaching; for destructive it is, how ever much our "scholars" may protest, and by whatever fine name it may be called. For the papers and magazines and books of the day are full of it. Besides, it is finding its way into many pulpits.

Thus we are brought face to face with a problem which, to my mind, is one of the greatest with which we have to deal. What are we going to do about it? What are we going to do to save our young people—and older ones, too—from confusion and doubt and ultimately indifference or infidelity? Do not tell me that I am an alarmist. My anxiety is based upon a rather wide acquaintance with young men and young women and a careful study of the problem that I am trying to get before you. "There are many ways to put out a fire; but closing one's eyes is not one of them." The fire is already burning; it will not do for us to close our eyes to the fact. We must do something! Some of our preachers and church papers and makers of books are doing a great deal and will, I hope, do even more. But is there not something else needed? Do we not need to meet these "scholars" on their own ground? Ought we not in defense of faith to meet "scholarly" assertion with teaching equally scholarly and authoritative?

At some of the universities of our country this need has been met in a way by the Bible Chairs. But this is not sufficient. It is only a beginning. The Bible Chairs are reaching only one in thousands of those that need help

The writer wants to urge a forward movement among our young men in the matter of thorough educational equipment for the work of biblical teaching. In our day we need Bible teachers as well as preachers. The ideal state of affairs would be to have in every congregation a man of university training—with a university degree—familiar with these great vital questions, who could deal with them in a way that would be convincing and satisfying to the people. But since this is at present impracticable, let us have at least a sufficient number of men to visit the churches, and by means of popular lectures and Bible institutes reach the people.

I do not mean to say that these Bible teachers should attack every conclusion of modern scholarship, as the manner of some is, but that they should be able to refute those claims that are false and help the people to adjust their faith to those conclusions which must be accepted. The common people will hear such men gladly.

Nor would I have any one think that I do not appreciate the need of plain gospel preaching in these days. All honor to the heroic men who, in faith and love and hope and humility, with great earnestness of life, and often at great personal sacrifice, are bringing men to Christ! Theirs is the grandest work on earth. But that other kind of work I have emphasized is needed, too. And our soul winners, our valiant soldiers of the cross, are too busy and too much needed right now in the great white harvest field of the world to take time to prepare for it. For this very reason I would lay this burden of mine upon the hearts of our young men who are just now getting ready for the work of life, and exhort them to enter this door of opportunity for splendid service in the cause of Christ.

A Baptist's Review of Helps to Faith.

This is a recent publication that has come into notice.

The book has two main divisions: 1. The "Facts on which Faith Rest." 2. "Some Obstacles to Faith." In Part One, in which are mentioned the methods and instrumentalities by which the soul is led to faith in the Christ, the divine Savior, the author has omitted the very important and absolutely essential instrumentality (so to speak) of the Holy Spirit, with out whom no soul on earth would ever come unto "a saving faith" in the blessed Son of God at all.

The words of Jesus are very plain, in regard to the sinner coming to, or believing in, Christ, in John 6:37. "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me," and in the 44th verse, "No man can come to me, except the Father draw him." Evidently the Holy Spirit is the great and mysterious power by which souls who are given to the Son of God are effectually led to exercise faith in him.

Being a strong believer in God's electing love for "poor sinners" from all eternity, this writer, who is a Baptist minister, can never divest his mind (and would not, if he could,) of the blessed truth contained in Paul's letter to the Romans, 8th chapter, 29th verse, "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son," etc. And in the 30th verse as follows: "Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified."

There is no shadow or shade, even the most remote, of Armimanism in this doctrine of Paul. The mistake that the author of "Helps to Faith" makes is (from our standpoint), that he makes the whole matter of the soul's salvation, or transformation, from death unto life to be effected by what he calls "the laws that govern man's nature"—that is, by natural law, altogether, leaving nothing for the Holy Spirit to do in bringing to pass that wonderful change of a "new life" that the forgiven soul realizes, when, through faith, it is "born again"—"born of water" (the living water of life, which is the word of God) "and the spirit"—that it may be able to "enter into the kingdom of God," as spoke the Lord Jesus to Nicodemus on that memorable night.

Par-Stimile Signature of John D. Brown, Inc.

Without going into detail further, we fear that the author of "Helps to Faith" is not as "sound in the faith" as he should be, on some points of vital importance; as, on page 185, in stating his opposition to the doctrine held by all enlightened Christians, that "the door of hope is forever closed against all who die impenitent," says, "It is not our prerogative, thank God, to close the doors of hope to any soul"—"but, personally," he has "no doubt that God will meet any of his penitent children, at any time, in any world, with pardon, who, for any reason, did not, in this life, yield to the tender pleadings of his love."

If this doctrine is "sound doctrine," then this writer has little more to say, except that on the question of future punishment we gather that the author of "Helps to Faith" does not hold the Scriptural doctrine of the eternal doom of the wicked, "in the world to come," but that the punishment of the ungodly in hell (if there be a hell, which he very much doubts) is not eternal, after all, where, in flames of fire, "the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever," but that the punishment of the wicked will be only "the operation of the law of spiritual attraction," in which he will reap, in the other world, "what he has sown in this."

It is evident that the author of the book in review believes that God does never "close the door of hope" to any who "die impenitent." (If this is not his belief, let him say so.) But that if God, in his mercy, shall choose to grant further opportunity, beyond death, for any soul to repent, that it "would be" a cause for our thanksgiving.

All of which belief is utterly groundless, in all the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, and we are well assured that the view entertained by the author of "Helps to Faith," in relation to the doctrine of "retribution," is not held by the "Disciples of Christ" in this latitude.

Our World's Fair Building.

I fear that many of our brethren fail to realize the value of the opportunity now offered us, by the proposed building for our people in the grounds of the World's Fair, in St. Louis. The Disciples of Christ will be there by the thousand, and the proposed building can be made a center for their religious, social and evangelistic fellowship. Our plea is worthy of the most extensive publication to the world, and from this place may be scattered in tract and book, story and sermon, the seed of the kingdom to the visitors of every land and race. It will be made a rendezvous for friends and brethren, a resting spot for the weary, a repository for the literature of all our missionary and benevolent societies. Let us not compel the committee to cut down the building in size and quality until it becomes inadequate for our purpose. Let every Disciple take pleasure in making some contribution, however modest in amount, to this enterprise. Delay will greatly hamper the committee in its work. Send your contribution now.

CALIFORNIA.—Watsonville, Mar. 8.—We go beyond apportionment for foreign missions and are happy. Let every church and every preacher wheel into line for $250,000. We cannot fail. We must not.—M. D. CLUBB.

Sanger.—Bro. McKeener is now in a good meeting here, with 28 additions, mostly conversions. Sister Hazelrig is faithfully and successfully pleading for Christ. The state work is moving grandly; why not, with McKeener as president and Dargitz as corresponding secretary? Two more competent and faithful workers cannot be found.—JOHN BALINGER.

CUBA.—Havana, March 2.—Last week we had four more accessions, making 14 in February. On Monday night of this week, in our fourth mission room, just opened, we had six confessions. We have 13 people awaiting baptism.—LOWELL MCPHERSON.

GEORGIA.—Valdosta, March 7.—We closed a three weeks' meeting here last night which resulted in 15 additions to the church, and much good otherwise. The meeting was conducted by home forces. We have here the strongest Christian church in South Georgia. We have almost completed a very pretty and convenient new church building, at a cost of about $15,000.—CHAS. E. POWELL.

IDAHO.—Caldwell, March 4.—I have just formed a "partnership" with Bro. J. P. Garmong, singer, of Denver, Col., and will now be ready to arrange future work accordingly. Our meeting here will close soon. Audiences have been good; 51 have responded to the invitation so far. We are to have an all-day session on Lord's day. Will raise a small debt and enlist the new members on current expenses. There are many very excellent workers here. Permanent address, Eugene, Oreg.—J. B. HOLMES.

ILLINOIS.—Virginia, March 10.—Our meeting here is full of interest and yet it is hard to move the people to action. There are four conversions to date. We raised about four times the apportionment for missions last Lord's day and all the members are happy. John W. Carpenter ministers to this people. He is on the second year of his work here. He is a noble man.—SIMPSON ELY, Joplin, Mo.

Charleston, March 17.—One hundred and eighty-five responses to gospel invitations in meeting led by Evangelist Allen Wilson to date. Meeting continues into next week. This is Charleston's greatest revival to date. Other churches have commenced revivals, but the Church of Christ had its best Monday night audience to-night.—WILL F. SHAW.

Mt. Sterling, Ill.—March 7.—A young woman made the good confession in our meeting last night. She is one of the sweetest singers in the state. The church has her employed to conduct the singing in the meeting. A telephone transmitter is hung in front of the pulpit and fifty or a hundred people listen to the sermons in their homes. Many of them live 10 and 15 miles in the country. Bro. N. E. Cary, the pastor, is 66 years old. He is not laid on the shelf, but is sweet spirited. His wife is president of the C. W. B. M. They are doing a fine work here. I expect to begin a meeting in Sedalia, Mo., March 17.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Lexington, March 8.—Mr. L. Pontius, of Long Point, Ill., closed a two weeks' meeting at Lexington, Ill., where Geo. H. Brown ministers, with 15 additions. These with those who united with the church before Brother Pontius' coming make 24 that have been added since last November.—Geo. H. BROWN.

Jacksonville, March 7.—Our meeting of 28 days' closed last night with 293 added. Scoville and Helm evangelists. This was the greatest meeting in the history of the city. The work was splendidly done and there is great joy in this city.—RUSSELL F. THRAPP.

Bloomington, March 11.—We are now in the third district missionary work. Have just closed a meeting at Ellisville with 10 additions: six by baptism, one from the Baptists and three reclaimed. We are now in a meeting at New Boston with excellent interest.—J. ORVILLE WALTON AND WIFE.

Waukegan, March 7.—Closed a 12 days' meeting last night with 10 additions: seven conversions, one by letter and two by statement. Stormed out.—J. H. SMART.

Barry.—Closed an excellent meeting at Sayre, Pa., Feb. 28. Direct results, 41 added to the church and several others who may be expected soon. The cold weather and an usual amount of sickness seemed to work against our meeting. Bro. M. B. Wood is doing excellent work as their pastor. This is his old home and he is well and favorably known by everybody. The church at Sayre bids fair to be one of our strong churches in Eastern Pennsylvania.—J. D. DABNEY.

Carbondale.—Closed March 8; 109 additions in four weeks. W. F. Shearer, evangelist, Chas. McVey, singer, H. G. Bennett, pastor.

Mt. Sterling, March 11.—Our meeting still continues, with 13 additions to date: seven baptisms and six otherwise. Bro. H. A. Northcutt is doing the preaching and Miss Briggs, of Chopin, singing.—WM. GREENALL.

Olney, Feb. 29.—There were three confessions last night; one a week ago, and two by letter shortly before that.—J. THOS. WEBB.

Harvey, March 10.—Our work at this place is progressing. Every branch of church work has taken on new life. Our Sunday services have more than doubled in attendance since we came. Prayer-meeting attendance has increased 75 per cent. At our prayer-meeting last night three came forward and confessed their faith in Christ. Since we came here we have preached special discourses to the I. O. O. F. and K. of P. orders, and last Lord's day preached the union temperance sermon at the First M. E. Church. We are hopeful and are looking forward to great things in the future.—JOHN J. HIGGS.

INDIANA.—South Bend, March 7.—The meeting at the First Church closed Feb. 28 with 49 additions. Most of these were by confession, and nearly all of them were adults. Bro. P. J. Rice, the pastor, did his own preaching in a masterly manner. His sermons were rich in thought and powerful in their presentation of the gospel. Mrs. Princess Long, as singing evangelist, devoted herself earnestly and diligently to the meeting.—R. L. HANDLEY, Pastor Indiana Avenue Chapel.

Veedersburg, March 5.—I desire to report a three weeks' meeting at Edward, Ind., with three accessions. Considering the very severe weather we had, and the fact that smallpox, measles, lagrippe and other forms of sickness prevailed in our territory, we think we had a good meeting. The church was much strengthened and the members encouraged. Brother Biddler, from Terre Haute, is their pastor. He was with us in one meeting on one Lord's day morning. Have had two funerals and two weddings since last report.

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful It Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly every body knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but, simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I got more and better charcoal in Stuart's absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Our work here is prospering, but is very slow in its progress.—A. W. GEHRES.

Fowler, March 11.—Three baptisms at prayer meeting last night. We will begin a two or three weeks' meeting April 3. My father, Isaiah P. Watts, Winchester, will do the preaching.—S. D. WATTS, Pastor.

Brook, March 7.—Eight added here the first week; fine prospect for a great revival.—EVANGELIST BENNETT.

Columbus, March 11.—I have just closed a two weeks' meeting at North Vernon, Ind., with 16 accessions. The 16 who came into the church are all good people and will make faithful members. No night of the last week that the house would hold the people. Interest intense. Everyone in North Vernon are now reading their Bibles to find out whether the doctrinal sermons that were preached are true or not. The church has taken on new life. All the old members have returned to the works of their first love. I will conduct one or two more revivals this year wherever I may be engaged.—L. A. BEARD, 1639 Ashland Avenue, Indianapolis, Ind.

Paragon, March 16.—Meeting here resulted in 20 baptisms. Bros. Harry G. Hill, of Indianapolis, and M. N. Yocum, of Martinsville, and I did the preaching. Good year in prospect for church.—CHAS. E. UNDERWOOD.

La Porte, March 11.—The LaPorte Christian church's offering for foreign missions was $51.35 on last Sunday.—GEO. E. HICKS, pastor.

Markle, March 11.—W. A. Diggins, of South Bend, was with us in a short meeting. Six were added by baptism. Brother Diggins is a good gospel teacher. He understands the gospel and is not afraid to declare the whole council of God. Raised our apportionment for missions very easily because the people had a mind to give. All departments of the church are in good condition. Outlook bright. Markle is now a dry town. Our last saloon closed its doors on March 6. Have been invited to preach at New Carlisle, Ind., on Mar. 13.—M. G. LORV, minister.

INDIAN TERRITORY.—Weleetka, March 9.—We have located here as a center from which to work the new towns along the Fort Smith and Western Railroad. Have begun regular preaching at two points where we expect to organize in a short time. Will organize in other towns along the line as fast as possible. The Weleetka Church continues one of our best in the territory.—A. M. HARRAL.

IOWA.—Prairie City.—We raised $17.75 Sunday, March 6. Our apportionment was $15. Yours for one-fourth million for missions.—A. L. ZINK.

Lenox, March 8.—One more added here by obedience. Corning now has a pastor in the person of Samuel Gregg, late of Elliott. He is now in a meeting there two days, and three added by confession. Prescott's meeting resulted in 24 added. We attended the great meeting in Creston one night last week, and was the guest of Brother Ingram. Wharton, of Baltimore, was the union evangelist in charge. Brother Ferguson, of Bedford, is not enjoying good health, we learn. We have begun the Sunday-school revival and hope to do much good thereby.—I. H. FULLER.

Iowa City, March 7.—Thirteen additions yesterday; four Thursday. All confessions but one. Crowded houses. Many were turned away last night. Helm is a gospel song leader of fine ability. Leach is a superior pastor. Meetings will continue two weeks.—H. H. MONINGER.

Long Grove, March 7.—We closed a twelve-days' meeting here last Thursday on account of the weather and roads. Bro. W. Carroll Radebaugh, song evangelist of Mason City, Ill., assisted us in the meeting. He is a young man of unusual musical ability and thoroughly understands vocal and instrumental music. He has a well-trained voice and is a good leader in song. The church gave my wife and I a reception Feb. 19. The outlook here is encouraging.—LEWIS GOOS.

Cincinnati, March 7.—Our meeting here has continued just 14 days: 66 additions—37 men, 29 women—many heads of families. We are reaching an excellent class of people. Brother Wickizer, of Bloomfield, is doing splendid preaching. We continue a few days. Full statistical report will be made when the meeting closes.—W. H. COLEMAN, pastor.

Des Moines, March 8.—Our special meetings in the East Side Church, which began Feb. 16, closed Monday, March 8. There were 16 added to the church. Bro. J. K. Shellenberger, of Mankato, Minn., did the preaching. Brother S. has a clear vision of Christian truth and preaches it with an earnestness that commands the attention of the people.—T. J. DOW.

Fairfield, March 8.—The first Lord's day in March was very stormy here. About one-third of our membership were present at the morning service, but our offering for foreign missions amounted to $27 in cash and pledges. The indications are that we will reach our apportionment and perhaps go beyond it. There were two additions to the church—one by confession and one from the Methodists. Our Sunday-school has gained 27 new scholars the past month. Our Christian Endeavor has pledged $5 a year to state work. In addition to this, they are supporting an orphan in India.—A. R. ADAMS.

Prescott, March 10.—We have been without a pastor since September, but a faithful few have kept every department of our church work going, and with very good interest. Bro. B. F. Hall, of Hamburg, Ia., commenced a series of meetings for us Feb. 8. Brother Hall is a most able and consecrated man. Our hearts were made to rejoice at the results of this meeting. Large audiences, good interest, and 28 came into the church, mostly all by confession. Our church is out of debt. Many are interested in our work as never before, and we now need a good man to take up our work permanently.—S. E. FACKLER, elder.

Centerville, March 9.—Dr. Charles Reign Scoville, of Chicago, Ill., is with us holding a meeting which began last Lord's day and will continue indefinitely. Our large house is crowded each night, and we hope to have a great meeting.—C. F. BROWN.

KANSAS.—Narka, March 7.—Meeting at this place closed with 73 added.—EDWARD CLUTTER, Washington, Kan.

Thayer.—We are in a prosperous condition. Four additions since I wrote to you last, with splendid prospects for great increase. Bro. Simpson Ely called for a big tent meeting in May.—C. E. CAMPBELL, minister.

Council Grove.—We raised our apportionment for missions in the church. The Endeavor raised $3. We are in a meeting here with Brother Cornelius, of Hoisington, doing the preaching. Interest good.—D. S. DÖMER.

Lyndon, March 7.—The work at this place is growing in interest. All departments of church work are getting in good shape. Offering taken for missions, and one addition yesterday.—J. F. POWERS.

Parsons, March 11.—The Parsons brethren have just closed a 17 days' rally. There were 52 accessions to the membership. Bro. R. H. Tanksley was with us for nine week day evenings. The pastor conducted the rally over Lord's days and Monday evenings, and the last five days, closing Wednesday evening, March 9. Four accessions the last service. One excellent lady made confession and was baptized yesterday at Ladies' Aid Society meeting. Of the 52 added, 29 were by confession and baptism; 80 additions since Nov. 1, 1903.—C. E. PILE, pastor.

MONTANA.—Whitehall, March 2.—We have just closed a three weeks' meeting here with 13 added to the church. H. E. Russell of Great Falls, did the preaching. Never before has the writer worked with a more consecrated man or earnest preacher. Mrs. J. Ellison Miller led the singing. Her sweet solos did much for the meeting. The church is stronger in every way, and better equipped for future work. The last of the month I go to the Northeast part of the State, Malta, for a short meeting. We have no organization there, but hope soon to have a preacher located in that part of the State.—B. L. KLINE, Pastor.

MISSOURI.—Palmyra, March 7.—One confession and baptism here Sunday.—W. HENRY JONES.

Palmyra, March 9.—Begin a meeting here with Crayton S. Brooks, of Jefferson City, on March 14. We are looking for helpful things in this meeting for Palmyra.—W. HENRY JONES.

Jeff City, March 10.—Three confessions at regular services last Sunday. I begin revival March 14 with W. Henry Jones at Palmyra. I am sending you a marked copy of Cole Co. Democrat. In addition to personal read Speed Mosby's editorials.—CRAYTON S. BROOKS.

Bolivar, March 8.—Two additions by letter yesterday. Full apportionment for foreign missions raised.—J. H. JONES.

Louisiana, March 7.—Bro. J. V. Coombs assisted by C. E. Wagner as singer, is with us in a meeting. Seventeen accessions to date. Thirteen yesterday. Meeting continues indefinitely.—M. S. JOHNSON.

Marceline, March 7.—There was one more addition at the prayer meeting last Thursday evening, and five in the regular services yesterday. Both members and ministers greatly encouraged in the work.—ALFRED MUNYON, pastor.

Cameron, March 7.—Our apportionment for foreign missions was $25 more than it has been before and we rejoice to know that the offering will pass the amount we were asked to give, which was $125 dollars. One confession at evening service.—RICHARD W. WALLACE.

Huntsville, March 7.—Thirty-five dollars Sunday for foreign missions. The C. W. B. M. met with the Junior Christian Endeavor in the afternoon; 35 juniors were present and 15 members of the auxiliary. The program was pronounced splendid. The church has voted the pastor a month's vacation to attend the fair. All departments of work are steady.—J. R. PERKINS.

Higginsville, March 7.—We raised our apportionment in full for foreign missions. We are in the midst of a meeting with 17 additions to date, 14 by confession. Brother Lindsey, who has been doing the preaching, has been called away from the meeting twice by the sickness and death of his baby boy. He will be with us again Monday evening. We

A TEST EXPERIMENT.

Peculiar Power Possessed by a New Medicine.

Of new discoveries there is no end, but one of the most recent, most remarkable and one which will prove invaluable to thousands of people, is a discovery which it is believed will take the place of all other remedies for the cure of those common and obstinate diseases, dyspepsia and stomach troubles. This discovery is not a loudly advertised, secret patent medicine, but is a scientific combination of wholesome, perfectly harmless vegetable essences, fruit, salts, pure pepsin and bismuth.

These remedies are combined in lozenge form, pleasant to take, and will preserve their good qualities indefinitely, whereas all liquid medicines rapidly lose whatever good qualities they may have had as soon as uncorked and exposed to the air.

This preparation is called Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and it is claimed that one of these Tablets or lozenges will digest from 300 to 3,000 times its own weight of meat, eggs and other wholesome food. And this claim has been proven by actual experiments in the following manner: A hard-boiled egg cut into small pieces was placed in a bottle containing warm water heated to ninety-eight degrees (or blood heat); one of these Tablets was then placed in the bottle and the proper temperature maintained for three hours and a half, at the end of which time the egg was as completely digested as it would have been in a healthy stomach. This experiment was undertaken to demonstrate that what it would do in the bottle it would also do in the stomach, hence its unquestionable value in the cure of dyspepsia and weak digestion. Very few people are free from some form of indigestion, but scarcely two will have the same symptoms. Some will suffer most from distress after eating, bloating from gas in the stomach and bowels, others have acid dyspepsia or heartburn, others palpitation or headaches, sleeplessness, pains in chest and under shoulder-blades, extreme nervousness as in nervous dyspepsia, but they all have the same cause—failure to properly digest what is eaten. The stomach must have rest and assistance, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets give it both, by digesting the food for it and in a short time it is restored to its normal action and vigor. At the same time the Tablets are so harmless that a child can take them with benefit. This new preparation has already made many astonishing cures, as for instance, the following:

"After using only one package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets I have received such great and unexpected benefit that I wish to express my sincere gratitude. In fact, it has been six months since I took the package and I have not had one particle of distress or difficulty since. And all this in the face of the fact that the best doctors I consulted told me my case was chronic dyspepsia and absolutely incurable, as I had suffered twenty-five years. I distributed half a dozen packages among my friends here who are very anxious to try this remedy." Mrs. Sarah A. Skeel, Lynnville, Jasper Co., Mo.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists everywhere at 50 cents for full sized packages. A little book on "Stomach Diseases" mailed free by addressing F A Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich

$900, which means we will support both a foreign and a home missionary. Therewere two confessions at the close of the morning service, and one added at night by statement. We are now in a meeting with Bro. C. M. Sharp, of Columbia, preaching.—L. J. MARSHALL.

Carrollton, March 9.—Closed a meeting at Green City, Mo., which continued 18 days with 32 additions, 24 confessions. All the additions were males except four.—J. B. LOCKHART.

Braymer, March 7.—We took our offering for foreign missions yesterday at Galt. The weather was very unfavorable, and the congregation was not well represented at either morning or evening services. One addition here since our last report.—J. D. PONTIUS.

Kansas City, March 7.—We have just closed a successful three weeks' meeting at the West Side with W. H. Alford, of Ladoga, Ind., evangelist; 42 additions, 25 by baptism, 14 by statement, three by letter. This meeting has been a real help to all departments of the church. Brother Alford is one of our best evangelists, a good preacher and personal worker. We can heartily recommend him to churches wanting an evangelist.—CLINTON ABER, pastor.

Waubesaun, March 12.—There were two added at Humansville last Lord's day by statement. One last month by confession not reported. Hope to report more soon.—S. E. HENDRICKSON.

Pleasant Hill, March 11.—Though our apportionment for foreign missions was increased this year, we meet it in full. In the last ten months we have gathered up about $155 here for missions of various kinds. One conversion recently, also several unreported weddings and as many funerals.—J. D. GREER

NEBRASKA.—Overton, March 7.—Yesterday was our first Lord's Day here. Good audiences, two received hand of fellowship who had recently been baptized. Y. P. S. C. E. re-organized with ten members. Bible school will begin Red and Blue Button contest next Lord's day. Prospects fine.—O. L. ADAMS, Pastor.

NEW MEXICO.—Roswell, March 7.—A great day in our church yesterday. Five additions at the morning service, making ten our first month. Our apportionment for foreign missions fully raised. All happy. It will, no doubt, be pleasing to our friends to learn that my health is already much improved. Bro. Jesse B. Haston, who resides here, did a fine preparatory work prior to my coming, and the future of our work there, as a consequence, looks most encouraging. To the Lord be all the praise!—C. C. HILL.

NEW YORK.—Buffalo, March 7.—Another added here yesterday. Am preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons to fine audiences. Could use a pastoral helper, but will plan to utilize my membership instead. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST like wine—improves with age. Its dress and contents both appeal to lovers of up-to-date and wide awake religious journals.—B. S. TERRALL.

Throopsville.—March offering exceeds apportionment by $10.00. 1902, $10.00, 1903, $8.70, 1904, $25.00. We rejoice in evidences of a missionary awakening. Writer preached six weeks on missions.—S. J. DUNCAN-CLARK.

OHIO.—Cleveland, March 7.—Two confessions here yesterday at the Dunham Avenue Church.—M. J. GRABLE.

Cleveland, March 12.—The Cedar Avenue Church, this city, held its annual business meeting Feb. 5. An elegant church banquet was served by the ladies. The reports were encouraging. Total money contributed, $2,730.96, of which $223 was given to missions. The number of additions was 33. More than half the year there were no Sunday evening services. The tone of the speeches at the banquet were hopeful. Good cheer prevailed. We look for a better year's work. A beautiful watch was placed in the hands of the pastor, which is greatly appreciated. This church has in it many choice spirits.—E. P. WISE.

Cleveland, March 8.—Miles Avenue Christian Church is in a progressing condition, our Bible-school has about doubled itself and our congregation fills our house and the interest seems to be continually increasing. A reception was given by the church to the new members numbering 130, and a purse of $55 in gold was presented to the pastor, T. Alfred Fleming, accompanied by a suitable address given by the elder of the church, Mr. E. E. Healy. Two additions since last report.—T. ALFRED FLEMING, pastor.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.—Hennessey, March 4.—Monday night marked the close of one of the best meetings the church here ever had. Bro. J. W. Garner, of Perkins, Okla., did the preaching. Forty-two were added to the church—25 by confession and 17 by letter and statement; four came from other churches; two of these, a man a wife, past seventy, had not been baptized. Our present resident membership is about 175. Brother Garner is regularly in evangelistic work again. He begins at Carney next Sunday. I close my work here April 1.—B. D. GILLISPIE.

Guthrie, March 9.—Report from Feb. 1 to March 6 at Ripley: two sermons, one baptism; at Orlando, 19 sermons, one baptism, four letters and one from denominations; at Potter, 12 sermons, 13 baptisms, 23 by letter and a church organized with 46 members. Orlando and Potter should have a minister for all his time.—JAMES R. MCINTYRE, L. L. Evangelist.

Gage, March 5.—Closed a two weeks' meeting at this place. Brother Ellis helped me three days, preaching once. Moved the Little Wolf congregation into town that was organized by Brother Ellis, 44 in number, gave three the right hand of fellowship who gave their names to Bro. Bates, four by statement and four immersed, making a congregation of 51. They want a preacher one half time at once. Write to Theo Hendrix, Gage, Okla. They must have a preacher at once at Oleta one-half time. Write to D. C. Ooley, Oleta. These two towns are eight miles apart on the railroad and will cooperate with pastor.—R. S. SMEDLEY, evangelist.

Weatherford, March 11.—We closed a three weeks' meeting here last Lord's day with 15 accessions—eight by baptism, 5 by statement and two by letter. This makes 45 since our coming Aug. 1, 1903. We closed with the best interest we ever had here and would have been continued but for the uncertainty of the weather, not more than half the time having been favorable while we did continue. The prospects for future work are very bright.—FRANK L. VAN VOORHEES.

OREGON.—Roseburg, March 7.—Exceeded our apportionment and last year's offering. Best audiences since my taking the work, Feb. 1st, 1904.—GEO. C. RITCHEY.

Corvallis, March 7.—Our apportionment for foreign missions was $20. At the close of the morning service yesterday, $50 was pledged in about ten minutes. At the evening service we reached a total of $865. This with the Children's Day offering will go to the support of Miss Edna Dale of Wuhu, China. This, we trust, is a step toward becoming a living link.—T. S. HANDSAKER.

VIRGINIA.—Martinsville, March 7.—One hundred and twelve dollars yesterday for foreign missions. This church will give this year $162 to this work. Considering that we are surrounded by "hard shellin'," and that there is much prejudice to foreign work, this is a great offering. J. D. Hamaker will arrive to-morrow and assist in a ten days' meeting.—W. H. BOOK.

Not New, But True.

Daniel Webster once said about a certain political proposition that "There were many new things about it, and many true things, but the trouble was that the true things were not new, and the new things were not true," a philosophy which shows that Webster's fame and reputation were not unmerited.

The Vita-Ore advertisement which appears in these columns from month to month is not a new offer. It is the same 30-day trial-no-pay-unless-benefitted offer which the readers of this paper have seen and read for the last three or four years' time, and which many hundreds have accepted, and are not sorry that they did so. It is of the kind that would appeal strongly to Webster, in that it is not new, but all true. Vita-Ore has been before the public for three decades, and its newness has long since worn off, and its worth been thoroughly established by the experience of the many thousands of sick and ailing people who have sought its aid. It has seen medicines come and go, but has gone right along, growing in popularity from month to month, year to year, always satisfying, always doing as advertised.

The proprietors, the Theo. Noel Company, Vita-Ore Bldg., Chicago, want you to try it. You don't pay a cent unless you are benefited; two cents postage upon your request for the treatment is all you need to get it. Why should you hesitate?

Representative Modern Preachers. By Lewis O. Brastow, D. D., Professor of Practical Theology in Yale University. (Macmillan.)

Dr. Brastow, as a student and teacher of the art of preaching, and as an efficient and honored professor of homiletics for many years in one of the foremost seminaries in the country, is pre-eminently competent to treat the subject which he has chosen. Nine great preachers of widely different types form the subjects of the nine chapters: Schleiermacher, Robertson, Beecher, Bushnell, Brooks, Newman, Mozley, Guthrie and Spurgeon. It requires a genuine breadth of vision and comprehensiveness of sympathy for one to treat adequately within the limits of one book such diverse geniuses as Spurgeon and Cardinal Newman, Schleiermacher and Beecher. If a criticism were to be passed upon Professor Brastow's book, it would be that it falls short of presenting a concrete and vivid picture of the personalities of the men. We have Beecher's characteristics exhibited in orderly array, but not Beecher. The elements of Robertson's homiletical genius and equipment are portrayed, but Robertson remains a shadowy and unsubstantial figure. But this is really not a defect, but a method which the author has doubtless chosen deliberately. He is not writing biographies or character sketches; he is studying these great preachers as preachers and for the instruction of those who are, like himself, professional students of the art of preaching. We can heartily commend the book to preachers and to those who wish to study analytically the elements which have contributed to the effectiveness of some of the world's greatest preachers.

Getting A Living; The Problem of Wealth and Poverty, or Profits, Wages and Trades Unionism. by George L. Bolen. (Macmillan, pp. 769. $2.00 net.)

The author claims a special qualification for viewing both sides and all sides of the industrial problem, from the fact that he has had varied experience both as employer and employee. He is at present doing the work of a skilled workman in his own shop and employing other workmen under him. The advantage of this duplex point of view is all that he claims for it, and no one can justly charge the author with perverting judgment in the interest of either capital or labor. The volume is a somewhat elaborate and comprehensive treatment of nearly all of the important problems of current economics. The single tax doctrine is discussed and condemned. The argument throughout is based upon what might be called the selfish theory of political economy—that the workman is justified in getting all he can, and that the employer is justified in buying labor as cheaply as he can, but the working out of this theory in detail is by no means harsh or mechanical. There is an interesting chapter on "Trades-Unionism and the Churches," in which the author defends the churches against the familiar charge that they are indifferent to the rights of the laboring class.

The Church and Young Men: A Study of the Spiritual Condition and Nature of Young Men and Modern Agencies for Their Improvement. By Frank Graves Cressey, Ph. D. Introduction by Prof. C. R. Henderson. (Revell, $1.25 net.)

Though this book was written as a thesis for a degree of Doctor of Philosophy, it has a degree of vitality and human interest not often found in doctors' theses. It is a scientific study of existing religious conditions with incidental suggestions toward their improvement. The study of the conditions themselves is full of suggestiveness. The author has not relied upon his own observation, though that has been wide and careful, but has secured the testimony of several hundred pastors and Christian workers and of a large number of young men regarding the relation of young men to the church, and the reasons therefor. A tolerably complete survey is given of the agencies which the church is at present employing to attract and hold young men. It is a thoroughly practical book and may be studied with profit by pastors and all religious workers whose work brings them in touch with young men.

On the Road to Arcady. By Mabel Nelson Thurston. Illustrated by Samuel M. Palmer. (Revell.)

Here is a delectable book for the spring-time. Among the other seasons in which it may be appropriately and entertainingly read might be mentioned summer, autumn and winter. It is a nature book with no annoying superfluity of scientific information in it. It is a story of human experience without a situation in it which is either hackneyed or too ingeniously novel. It is (quite incidentally) a love story without slush. The impulsive Ethelwyn, who warms the heart of her spinster relative and several other hearts beside, and whose devotion to nature-study is counterbalanced by a frivolous fondness for the flesh-pots of polite society, is a character closely akin to Nancy—she of the "Misdemeanors"—and not a whit less refreshing than Elizabeth of the "Visits."

The New Thought Simplified By Henry Wood. (Lee and Shepard. $.80 net.)

"The new thought" is not simplified down to the point of definition in this volume, but by a careful perusal of the several chapters, we gather that it is a combination of mysticism and mind cure; a spiritual passivity which invites the influx of divine forces, as a vacuum invites an rushing of the surrounding air; a silence of the soul in which the still small voice of God becomes audible; a control of body by the influence of mind, to the end that sin and suffering and ugliness may vanish, and that health, holiness and beauty may take their place. The book contains some sensible things and some which, from the standpoint of the unilluminated, are otherwise.

Grace Before Meat. By Amos R. Wells. (United Society of Christian Endeavor. 25 cents.)

This is a unique contribution to the literature of prayer. In eighty beautifully printed pages, Mr. Wells has gathered the largest and best collection of table blessings ever made. Many are by the editor. Others are by various famous authors. Some are adapted to special occasions, others for any time. We need to be taught how to pray, and even in so simple a thing as grace before meat, the suggestions of these truly great and devout souls may avail much to deliver us from flatness, narrowness and perfunctoriness.

Scenes and Sayings in the Life of Christ. By James H. Snowden, D. D. ($1.50 net, Revell.)

The fifty chapters which make up this volume were originally written as expositions of the International Sunday-School Lessons. Taken together they form a fairly complete expository life of Christ. They are without critical or historical value, but contain considerable homiletical suggestiveness.

ZOO.

Is a parlor game manufactured by The Henderson-DePew Co. of Jacksonville, Ill. It consists of 150 fine cards, each bearing an illustration of some one of fifteen different animals and lettered from A to O—ten cards of each kind.

The game can be played by from three to eight persons. The object is for each player to secure as many cards, by means of rules of matching explained with the directions, as possible. The one securing the greatest number wins. It affords considerable innocent amusement for a parlor gathering.

Sources.

I passed a stagnant marsh that lay
Beneath a reeking scum of green,
A loathsome puddle by the way;
No sorrier pool was ever seen.
I thought: "How lost to all things pure
And clean and white those foul depths be."— Next day from out that pond obscure
Two queenly lilies laughed at me.

I passed a hovel 'round whose door
The signs of penury were strewn;
I saw the grimed and littered floor,
The walls of logs from tree-trunks hewn.
I said: "The gates of life are shut
To those within that wretched pen;
But, lol from out that lowly hut
Came one to rule the world of men."

One Boy's Chance.

A gentleman stopped suddenly before a sign that told him messenger-boys were to be had inside. He hesitated, and then went in.

"How many boys have you in now?" he asked.

"Six," was the reply; "it's dull to-day."

"Boys," said the gentleman, eying them scrutinizingly, "I suppose you know there is to be an exhibition of trained dogs to-night?"

The faces of the boys showed that they were perfectly aware of that fact, and that they might even give him some points in regard to it.

"Well, I'm looking for a boy to take a blind man to see it."

A titter was the first response; then followed a variety of expressions, as "What could a blind man see?" and "You can't guy us that way."

"I'm not jesting; I'm in earnest," said Mr. Davis; and then, looking at one of the boys who had said nothing, he asked: "Well, what do you think of it?"

"I think I could do it," was the reply.

"How do you propose to make him see it?"

"Through my eyes, sir. That's the only way he could see it."

"You're the boy I'm after," said Mr. Davis, and he arranged for him to meet the blind man.

The exhibition was in a large theater, and the blind man and his guide had a box to themselves, where they would disturb no one; but Mr. Davis, from his seat in the audience, knew that the boy was telling what went on, so that the blind man could understand. Indeed, no one applauded more heartily than the blind man himself.

The following day Mr. Davis again appeared among the messenger-boys, and after a few words with the manager, said:

"Boys, there was offered every one of you, yesterday, a chance for lifting yourselves up in the world, but only one of you grasped it. My friend, the blind man, has felt for some time that he might get much pleasure out of life if he could find some young eyes to do his seeing for him, with an owner who could report intelligently. My friend is delighted with the experiment. He says he is sure I hit upon

Our Currency.

Until 1785 no national coinage was established, and none was issued until 1793. English, French, Spanish and German coins, of various and uncertain value, passed from hand to hand. Beside the nine-pences and fourpence-ha'-pennies, there were bits and half-bits pistareens, picayunes and fips. Of gold pieces there were johannes, or joe, the doubloon, the moidore, and pistole, with English and French guineas, carolins, ducats and chequins. Of coppers there were English pence and half-pence and French sous; and pennies were issued at local mints in Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The English shilling had everywhere degenerated in value, but differently in different localities; and among silver pieces the Spanish dollar, from Louisiana and Cuba, had begun to supersede it as a measure of value. In New England the shilling had sunk from nearly one-fourth to one-sixth of a dollar; in New York to one-eighth; in North Carolina to one-tenth. It was partly for this reason that in devising a national coinage the more uniform dollar was adopted as the unit. At the same time the decimal system of division was adopted instead of the cumbersome English system, and the result was our present admirably simple currency, which we owe to Gouverneur Morris, aided as to some points by Thomas Jefferson. During the period of confederation, the chaotic state of the currency was a serious obstacle to trade, and it afforded endless opportunities for fraud and extortion. Clipping and counterfeiting were carried to such lengths that every moderately cautious person, in taking payment in hard cash, felt it necessary to keep a small pair of scales beside him and carefully weigh each coin, after narrowly scrutinizing its stamp and deciphering its legend.—John Fiske in "The Critical Period of American History."

A Visit to Thomas A. Edison.

To one who knows anything at all of Edison, the first glimpse of his house and its surroundings comes with a shock of surprise. Who would have suspected that this most democratic of men would have chosen for himself environments so essentially aristocratic? He lives in the heart of a splendid park, patterned after the English idea of vigorous exclusiveness, its gates jealously guarded by a lodge-keeper.

The interior of the house is in keeping with the atmosphere of the park without, quite unlike Edison. The reception room was utterly different from what I expected. The admirably draped curtains, the tables and chairs arranged with an eye for artistic effect, were not of Edison's choosing. He cares too little for the luxuries of life. This was his wife's work; it was all so womanly.

I heard quick footsteps behind me, and Edison appeared, greeting me cordially and unaffectedly. He was dressed in the queerest of costumes—a long blouse that reached to his heels, evidently of his own pattern, serviceable and work-worn.

"Come along into the laboratory," he said.

So I followed him through the dining room and the "den" into the laboratory that he has fitted up for himself in his home. There I found his little boy, his shirt sleeves rolled up, his face and hands smeared like his father's. They had been making various compounds, of which lampblack was the chief constituent.

"So you work on Sunday, too?"

Edison winked confidentially. "You see, Mrs. Edison is away. I can do as I like."

That brought back to me a story that I had once heard from a friend of his—a story of how he works night after night in this laboratory, utterly absorbed in his experiments. Midnight comes and goes, the gray dawn creeps in, and still finds him bending over his test-tubes and retorts, until at last Mrs. Edison appears, and fondly leads him away to sleep.

I looked around the laboratory. This at least was his room. There were Bunsen burners, mortars and pestles, glass rods, chemists' watch crystals, bottles of chemicals scattered about in bewildering profusion. I watched him and his boy while they worked, the boy listening with rapt attention to the teachings of his father. — Woman's Home Companion.

The mistress (arranging for the dinner): "Didn't the grocer send the macaroni?"

"Yis, mum; but I sint it back. Ivery wan of them stims wuz empty."

Proudman: "Did you ever hear my little girl recite? I believe she'll be an elocutionist when she grows up."

Hardman: "Oh, it may not be so bad as that. She may outgrow it."

A teacher was explaining to a little girl how the trees developed their foliage in the springtime.

"Oh, yes," said the little miss, "I understand; they keep their summer clothes in their trunks."

WING ORGANS

We make the Wing Organs and sell them ourselves. They go direct from Factory to Home.

We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. This profit that we charge is very small because of the large number of organs we sell. A single agent or dealer sells very few organs in a year and has to charge a large profit.

You save from $50. to $150.

by buying an organ direct from the factory.

Sent on Trial. We Pay Freight. No Money in Advance.

We will send a Wing Organ to any part of the United States on trial. We pay all freight charges in advance. We deliver the organ to your railroad depot free of expense to you. We do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. You can try the organ right in your home for 20 days, and if not satisfactory to you we will take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the organ. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

EASY MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Thirty-four years' experience enables us to guarantee every Wing Organ for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship, or material. Wing Organs need absolutely no tuning. They have a sweet tone, easy action, very handsome case.

Sin is unseemly, and I would that not
On all my soul's fair shewn appear one spot;
Keep me from sin, O Lord!

Sin is disease—my own most precious soul Must glow with perfect health, be clean and

Keep me from sin, O Lord!

Sin grieveth Thee, and hideth Thy loved face;
Vainly lips strive to praise, hands serve,

Woman's Independence.

There is an increasing tendency among women to get on without the other half of the human whole. In the last decade they have espoused the idea of sex independence to such an extent that, in the minds of a great many persons (of the opposite sex, of course), the situation is assuming complications.

It is not probable that the impulse behind the movement is due to woman's aspirations to achieve something apart from man. That is not her nature. It is less probable that it is due to a diminishing faith in marriage. That is necessary to the completion of human happiness as it is conceived of by her. The only conclusion then is that circumstances have driven her to self-dependence.

She has been remarkably successful in her new role. Though, in the majority of instances, underpaid and forced to struggle with the prejudice against her entering the bread-winning field, she has moved gradually up until in many vocations she stands shoulder to shoulder with man, and in not a few has even surpassed him. She has proved her ability to be independent. The experience, though frequently bitter, has braced her and made her more reliant. She no longer considers marriage a material state that must be entered sooner or later. In her new dignity she can make uncompromising terms.

Woman has in no wise suffered by this departure. It has only put a higher temper into the fine steel of her nature. She deserves not the slightest censure for her course, for she would not have abandoned her traditional and conventional place in the scheme of life had not intolerable conditions prompted her action.

True, this situation is out of alignment with the central plan of things, which accounts for the supposed complications. It is true that domestic life is suffering from the movement, but domestic customs have lagged in the march of progress and, for the most part, are hard and burdensome. It is true that as woman increases in numbers as a wage-earner the number of home-makers is reduced. It is true that there are fewer marriages and births. It is true that this seems to be a serious defect in the very foundation of the social structure. But it is also true that it will all be for the best. Disorganization always precedes reorganization. The pendulum has swung out rather far, but it will swing back.

Woman's hand has figured in one way or another in most of the reformations worth mentioning in history.

She may have a part in the social and industrial reformation so much needed now. There is every reason to believe that her independence as she will work it out will result in good for herself and man. She will equalize sex and balance it and impart a new influence to civilization that will carry it forward with an ennobling sweep.—Facts and Fiction.

"Well, how do you like married life?" inquired the friend.

"Not at all," replied the man who had married money and was suffering for it, "I'm a case of matrimonial dyspepsia."

"Matrimonial dyspepsia?"

"Yes. She never agrees with me; she's too rich."

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

The Green Witch.

CHAPTER V.—CONCLUDED.

"Sit you down!" cried Flora, pushing him upon the bench. Then she seated herself upon a rug at his feet and looked upon at him. "That's where you ought to sit, George Clayton," she said, "and here's where I ought to sit. If there was a lower place than this, I'd take it."

"What do you mean?" asked George, smiling down upon the pretty face and the graceful form.

"You are that much better than I am!" declared Flora, shaking her head at him. At these words George jumped from the bench with a flushed face, laughing, but resolute. As Flora refused to rise, he sat upon the floor beside her.

"Give us the story of this bench," said Flora, facing the empty seat.

George blushed and laughed, and then said, "You won't tell?"

"Not a word!" cried Flora. "Oh, this begins good!"

"One night we gave a moonlight party," said the other, choosing his words slowly and carefully. "And the prettiest girl at that party—or at least I thought so,—was Linnie Greer."

"I don't think she's so very pretty," observed Flora, judicially.

"Well, it was night, you know," George explained apologetically. "We were playing 'clap-in-and-clap-out.' She chose me, and I guessed her; but when I went to kiss her,—you know,—she ran away. She ran here. So did I. She didn't get real mad. Anyway I kept begging her not to mind about it,—she sat on the bench,—but she wasn't really crying, at all—I had thought so."

"You were green!" exclaimed Flora severely.

"Well, her head was hidden in her arms, and she pretended to be crying."

"Yes," said Flora dryly; "and after you had begged awhile, she laughed. So you found she was just pretending."

"How did you know?" demanded George.

"Ain't I a girl?" inquired Flora. "Then you sat with her on the bench and talked?"

"Yes. And after that we were particular friends, you know."

"She's mighty paticular not to invite you to her party," remarked Flora. "I think I'll get Spotsy to take this old bench out of here. I didn't like it the first time I saw it!"

"Didn't you?" exclaimed her companion. "I always thought ever so much of this bench!"

"I think we'll burn it up," said Flora. "Come on away. How silly we must look, sitting down here on the floor before the crazy old thing!"

As they passed the parlor-window, George felt a sudden fear that she might demand a story about it. Before his mind rose the forlorn figure of Marget listening on wintry nights to the music from within. As if Flora had read his thoughts, she said abruptly, "George who is the Green Witch?"

"Why do you ask?" demanded George, staring at the window as if he imagined it had betrayed him.

"Linnie Greer said to ask you. She said you knew all about her."

"Well, I don't!" The man who drove the delivery-wagon before your father bought the grocery, was Tuck Hootin. His daughter is called the Green Witch by a lot of people. But I don't know why. I have heard references made to the Green Witch, but it's just a nickname, like they call Jim Greer 'Peanuts.' In that rainstorm yesterday, I met her about a mile from town, and she asked me to let her ride. So I had to, and Linnie saw us, and that's all I know."

"You shouldn't have let her ride with you," Flora declared, with decision.

"But the rain—don't you remember how it poured? And she was tramping along barefooted through ankle-deep mud. When she asked me, I had to let her ride."

"You can't be with common people," said Flora, "and expect uncommon people to stand by you. If you don't hold yourself up, don't expect other people to support you. They have their own weight to carry."

"Then where do charity and kind acts come in?" demanded George.

"They don't come in," replied Flora, with a shrewd nod of the worldly-wise little head. "I hope you'll never be seen with that person again. To be called 'Green Witch' is bad enough. But if her real name's 'Hootin' that's worse. Tell me about these two sugar-maples."

"Mother always stretched her hammock between them about this time of the afternoon," said George, "and I brought out a chair, and read aloud to her. We read 'David Copperfield' here, and 'Wide, Wide World,' and 'Queechy,' and a lot more."

"Let's try it now," said Flora. "I never liked to read, but maybe if I'm in a hammock it'll be different. Will you read to me?"

George was delighted. He went with her into the house, and presently they returned with a camp-chair, the hammock, cushions and the first volume of "Bleak House." When Flora lay at ease with her chin propped upon her hand, George began to read with a sense of delicious comfort and enjoyment. He had not read long when Flora interrupted him.

"Isn't that dull though!"

"Well!" said George, "it starts off a little bit heavy—but just wait! There's one of the best detectives in it you ever read about."

"Detectives? I thought your mother didn't like detectives, and dead men's hands!"

"Oh, but they were dime-novel detectives."

"I guess," remarked Flora, "that there would be no danger of ever getting too excited over a detective in a first class novel, would there? Well, go ahead."

George continued with the scene in Chancery, till the musical voice again stopped him; "George, where is that detective?"

"Why," said George, "he doesn't come in till the second volume."

Flora sat up. "No wonder this kind isn't dangerous, when you thin it that way! George, I've been thinking how strange it is that your mother died when she was so strong and gay and playful, and your father lived, though he was always so delicate and studious."

"Yes," said George gravely, "it seems strange."

"Did she die in this house?"

"Oh! no; far away. In Canada. She left us to visit father's sister, aunt Martha. Aunt Martha lives in in Florida, where father is now; but then, she was in Canada. Mother went to visit her, and while she was skating, one night, the ice broke, and—she was drowned."

"And they sent the body back here?"

"No, we had lost our property then, and father had aunt Martha attend to everything. She was buried out there in Canada. She had just been gone three weeks when the telegram came. Some day I shall go there and visit the grave. . . . The last I saw of her, she was so bright and strong and full of life! And she was strange, too. It looked like she felt something was going to happen. The night before she started, I heard her crying in her room,—she was crying dreadfully. When I crept in, she tried to laugh,—and strangled. She didn't seem herself. She must have had a presentiment."

"Where was your father?" asked Flora.

"I don't like to think about that time," said George. "May I not read to you?"

She assented, and he resumed the book. Presently the shadow left his face, and he forgot the past. When he looked up, at the end of the chapter, Flora lay at full length in the hammock, her slipped feet crossed demurely, her bare arms locked above the sunny hair. Little flecks of sunlight danced upon the creamy complexion, as the breeze gently stirred the overhanging branches of the sugar-maples. The lids were closed like rose leaves that have curled up to hold the dew, and the rosy mouth was slightly open, while the bosom rose and fell with the strong regular breath of the sleep of youth.

Personal to Subscribers!

A BARREL

of Vita-Ore is not necessary to convince you that it is the best remedy in, on or out of the earth for ailing people, to prove to you positively that it will cure your ills, as it has the ills of so many others. One ounce of the Ore (one package) mixed with a quart of water, one month's treatment, is all that you need for the test, all the evidence we want to submit, and we want to send it to you at our risk. You are to be the judge! One month's treatment with this natural remedy will do for you what six month's use of other advertised treatments cannot. If it does not, you to decide, we want nothing from you!

Read Our Special Offer.

WE WILL SEND to every subscriber or reader of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST or worthy person recommended by a subscriber, a full-sized One Dollar package of VITA-ORE, by mail, post-paid, sufficient for one month's treatment, to be paid for within one month's time after receipt, if the receiver can truthfully say that its use has done him or her more good than all the drugs or dopes of quacks or good doctors or patent medicines he or she has ever used. Read this over again carefully, and understand we ask our pay only when it has done you good and not before. We take all the risk; you have nothing to lose. If it does not benefit you, you pay us nothing. Vita-Ore is a natural, hard, adamant, rock-like substance—mineral—Ore—mined from the ground like gold and silver, and requires about twenty years for oxidation. It contains free iron, free sulphur and magnesium, and one package will equal in medicinal strength and curative value 800 gallons of the most powerful, efficacious mineral water drunk fresh at the springs. It is a geological discovery, to which there is nothing added or taken from. It is the marvel of the century for curing such diseases as Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, Blood Poisoning, Heart Trouble, Dropsy, Catarrh and Throat Affections, Liver, Kidney and Bladder Ailments, Stomach and Female Disorders, La Grippe, Malarial Fever, Nervous Prostration and General Debility, as thousands testify, and as no one, answering this, writing for a package, will deny after using. Vita-Ore has cured more chronic, obstinate, pronounced-incurable cases than any other known medicine, and will reach such cases with a more rapid, powerful curative action than any medicine, combination of medicines, or doctor's prescription which it is possible to procure:

VITA-ORE will do the same for you as it has for hundreds of readers of this paper if you will give it a trial. Send for a $1.00 package at our risk. You have nothing to lose but the stamp to answer this announcement. If the medicine does not benefit you, write us so and there is no harm done. We want no one's money whom Vita-Ore cannot benefit. Can anything be more fair? What sensible person, no matter how prejudiced he or she may be, who desires a cure and is willing to pay for it, would hesitate to try Vita-Ore on this liberal offer? One package is usually sufficient to cure ordinary cases; two or three for chronic, obstinate cases. We mean just what we say in this announcement, and will do just what we agree. Write to-day for a package at our risk and expense, giving your age and ailments, and mention this paper, so we may know that you are entitled to this liberal offer.

READ WHAT HE SAYS.

If I should search all the vocabularies of all the nations for words, and delve into the lore of all peoples for wisdom, I could not then tell you the joy that has come to me through your Vita-Ore. All last winter I suffered from indigestion and Acute Bronchitis, and frequently dreaded to retire to my bed for the night, but since taking Vita-Ore sleep like the proverbial "pig in clover." In April I engaged to drive out to New Britain (ten miles home again) every Sunday afternoon and preach them a sermon as I had done for seven years. Well I was so much worse after sending my appointment for the 3rd of May that I had to recall my appointment for the future but I recovered so signally under Vita-Ore treatment that, after two weeks I recommenced my appointments at New Britain, and have met them since with the exception that I attended our New York Eastern Christian Conference in Petersburg, N. Y., where I walked three miles daily, though I have not been able heretofore to walk half a mile per day. I will be eighty years old next December. I have been a preacher of the Gospel fifty-four years. I can recommend Vita-Ore to man or woman, for I believe it renovates the entire material or physical body or system. My work now is to preach a sermon at 11 o'clock in the morning, in Red Rock, N. Y. and then ride ten miles to New Britain and preach a sermon there, and then ride home again.—REV. JOHN MCGLAUFLIN, East Chatham, N. Y.

GLAD HE ACCEPTED.

The Rev. T. H. Mansfield, the Well-Known Ohio Pastor, Testifies That He and Wife are Both Benefited.

DEFIANCE, OHIO.

My wife and myself have been greatly benefited by the Vita-Ore treatment, and are thankful that we accepted the trial offer made in our church paper. I had been an invalid for three years, taking much doctors' medicines and many patent remedies during that time, and now consider that Vita-Ore has made a new person of me. No one, unless they have themselves been a sufferer from Kidney, Gravel and Liver Trouble can tell of the great pain I endured. I can testify to the fact that Vita-Ore is a remarkable as well as reliable remedy, and personally believe that none other can be so great a benefactor to the race. I heartily recommend it to the public.

Not a Penny Unless You Are Benefited

This offer will challenge the attention and consideration, and afterward the gratitude of every living person who desires better health, or who suffers pains, ills and diseases which have defied the medical world and grown worse with age. We care not for your skepticism, but ask only your investigation, and at our expense, regardless of what ills you have, by sending to us for a package. ADDRESS

Current Events

The more the people of St. Louis think about the outrages which were committed in this city on Saturday, March 12, in connection with the Democratic primary election, the hotter grows their indignation. A mass meeting of representative Democrats, who do not believe in criminality as an essential element of party loyalty, was held on Thursday evening in Chatsworth Hall (the building formerly occupied by the First Christian Church.) This gathering furnished an occasion for some forcible utterances in protest against the lawlessness and violence which have characterized our local politics in recent years, and especially against the protection of the same by those who occupy official positions and are sworn to protect the peace and dignity of the city. The resolutions which were adopted, after asserting the complete absence of home rule—the essential principle of Democracy—from the municipalities of this state, include the following:

We demand that the police and election laws of these great cities be taken out of the hands of any executive who dares to link his fortune with the vicious and corrupt, and that they be placed in the hands of men who hold patriotism and justice above the base advantages of criminal partisanship. Be it therefore Resolved, That we, as patriotic citizens, now and henceforth shall make continued and unrelenting war against these men, their methods and the laws now upon the statute books; and be it further Resolved, That we call upon our brother Democrats and all patriotic citizens throughout the state of Missouri to aid and assist us, not only in driving the givers and takers of bribes from public office, but in extirpating these laws which rob honorable and noble men of their rights, liberty and property.

Dr. R. A. Holland, rector of an important Episcopal church of this city, an ex-confederate soldier and a life-long Democrat, sent to the mass meeting an open letter in which he characterized Mr. Hawes as "the unscrupulous young adventurer now at the head of your city politics," and asserted that "The governor of the state has at last uncovered himself as its arch anarchy and patron of the ruffianism." Speaking further of the governor, he says:

"For three years he has played the part of prompter from behind the scenes. His whisper, though as low as he could breathe it, has been heard from Kansas City to St. Louis. Throughout the commonwealth he governs, he has become notorious for a peculiar 'wink' . . . The governor said some words to the police board of St. Louis about keeping order at the polls; but the board saw the 'wink' in the words, and acted accordingly. The words were for the public, the 'wink' was for the board. . . . He cannot shelter himself behind words which his commonwealth has long since learned to be worthless. The 'wink' was too loud. It has reverberated in every township, in every farmhouse of the state, and traveled across the nation from sea to sea. He has winked away the freedom of St. Louis and the fair name of Missouri."

Governor Dockery has instructed the Board of Police Commissioners to investigate the conduct of the police force at the recent Democratic primaries. Three of the four members of this board, who are appointed by the governor, were Hawes candidates at this very election. Any investigation conducted by them cannot be other than ex parte. After the grand jury had taken the matter up, the Police Commissioners asked their help in the investigation, and practically turned the entire matter over to the grand jury. Up to the present time, indictments have been brought in against one police sergeant and seven officers, and against John J. Lavin, Democratic central committeeman for the twenty-eighth ward. The governor said he was forewarned that there would be disturbances at the primaries, and gave special instructions to the Police Commissioners and to the acting chief of police. They ought to know whether the governor meant his warnings to be taken seriously or not. Judging from the results, they thought not.

Another interesting result of the disturbances at the St. Louis Democratic primaries, is that it has given Gov. Dockery an occasion for declaring himself definitely against Folk's candidacy for governor. He rebukes Folk for his lax adherence to the principles of Democracy, and especially for unfaithfulness to the representatives of the party. His greatest offense lay in not rallying to the defense of the "Democratic cause" against the "vicious attacks" which have been made on the management of the state forces during the past two years. Gov. Dockery seems to labor under the same delusion which vitiates the reasoning of so many partisan politicians, that the criterion of party loyalty is willingness to uphold every representative and every act of the party, right or wrong. There are few good causes that do not number among their advocates some base men. There is always a possibility that within any limited district one of the great political parties will fall into unscrupulous hands. In such cases the honest men of that party cannot do less than protest against the indignities which are being carried on in the name of the party. To charge them on that account with disloyalty to the party, is to subordinate the party's principles to the political welfare of the unworthy men who have gotten into the saddle. Such is the protest which Mr. Folk is making in the interest of honest Democracy, and such is the criticism to which he is being subjected by politicians of the type of Harry Hawes and Gov. Dockery.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Northern Securities case confirms the action of the Circuit Court is dissolving the "merger" of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern Railroads under the Northern Securities Company. It was a five to four decision; Justices Holmes, White, Peckham and Fuller dissenting. The present Supreme Court apparently has a penchant for rendering decisions by the narrowest possible majority. The opinion of the Court, which was prepared by Justice Harlan, affirms two points: First, that the Sherman Anti-trust act of 1890 is constitutional and therefore valid; second, that it is sufficient to prevent the stifling of competition in interstate commerce in such cases as this. It has been claimed in defense of the merger that the mere existence of a combination between two parallel and competing roads could not be construed as restraint of trade, but that it must be shown that trade was actually being restrained before such combination could be dissolved by the application of the Sherman act. In reply to this the Court said: "The mere existence of such a combination and the power acquired by the holding company as trustee for the combination, constitute a menace to and a restraint upon that freedom of commerce which Congress intended to recognize and protect, and which the public is entitled to have protected." Again it had been asserted that the prohibitions of the Sherman act applied only to unreasonable combinations, thus leaving a wide margin of uncertainty as to what combinations are unreasonable enough to fall within the prohibition of the statute. The Court held that the law applied to all "direct restraints, reasonable or unreasonable." The threat that if this case were decided against the railroads there would be a general financial convulsion, is met by this statement: "It is the history of monopolies in this country and in England that predictions of ruin are habitually made by them when it is attempted, by legislation, to restrain their operations and to protect the public against their exactions." The dissenting opinions were based in part upon the theory that since any individual (say Mr. Morgan or Mr. Hill) has an undoubted constitutional right to purchase a controlling interest in two parallel roads, the right to do the same thing cannot be constitutionally denied to a corporation. The Court, however, held that the purchase of the stock of these two roads by the Northern Securities Company was not a bona fide purchase, but only a device for the creation of a monopoly.

An order has been issued by Pension Commissioner Ware and the Secretary of the Interior which will forestall the attempt now being made by the G. A. R. to secure the passage of a bill to pension all veterans of the Civil War regardless of age or disability. It has been argued that since the universal service pension for veterans of the Mexican War was adopted in 1887, thirty-nine years after the close of that war, the same ought to be done for veterans of the Civil War, now that an equal period has elapsed since it closed. It was estimated roughly that such a provision would add fifty or sixty millions annually to the expenditure for pensions. Under the new order, all Civil War veterans over sixty-two years of age are presumed to be in some measure disabled for active work, and may receive a pension of from six to twelve dollars a month, according to age, without further proof of disability. It is estimated that this policy will add about twenty millions a year to the annual pension budget.

Our Moro dependents in the Philippines, in spite of their promises of reformation, stimulated by subsidies for their chiefs, have lapsed back into their more normal condition of hostility to every one outside of their own ranks. There have been some treacherous attacks upon American soldiers recently, and so much disorder and uneasiness that the Secretary of War has found it necessary to annul the treaty made with them in 1899 and to begin the work of pacification all over again. The treaty was not a formal diplomatic document, but only an executive order subject to termination at the will of either party, and Secretary Taft holds that since the Moros have already violated it by their unfriendly acts, it is better for our government to annul the agreement than to continue to pay subsidies which are expended for the support of hostile operations against our own troops.

Secretary Taft has been giving some information to the House Committee on Insular Affairs in connection with the pending bill to improve and extend civil government in the Philippines. In that connection he has taken occasion to deny the oft-repeated assertion that polygamy and slavery were approved in this treaty with the Moros. Gen. Leonard Wood is to lead a military force into the Moro country at once. The senate's confirmation last week of his appointment as Major General, ends a long and bitter fight. An attempt was made by the less scrupulous portion of the opposition to make political capital out of the allegation that President Roosevelt was promoting his friend over the heads of other officers, to the detriment of the service. As a matter of fact, President Roosevelt never promoted Gen. Wood over anyone's head. His remarkably rapid promotion was the act of President McKinley. Since Mr. Roosevelt became President, Gen. Wood's advancement has been only in accordance with the regular rule of seniority.

Secretary Taft is said to be planning a tour of inspection in the Philippine Islands for next year. This, if he makes it, will be part of the program to which the administration is already committed. The existing Philippine legislation provides that two years after the completion of the census of the islands, which is now being taken, if there shall be complete and universal peace in the archipelago, outside of the Moro's territory, the President shall order a general election at which delegates shall be chosen to a popular legislative assembly. This elected house of delegates, together with the Philippine Commission appointed by the President, will constitute the legislative body for the control of local insular affairs. Secretary Taft's trip will be made with a view to determining whether or not the condition requiring the pacification of the country has been fulfilled.

The party leaders are diligently canvassing the situation to determine how they can make an issue of the Philippine situation in the approaching campaign. The Republicans will doubtless be satisfied to "stand pat" on the achievements up to date and the promise of a continuation along the same lines. It is not improbable that the Democrats will incorporate in their platform a plank calling for a definite promise of ultimate independence for the Philippine Islands, such as we gave to Cuba. Such a plank would command the approval of a large number of conservative and level-headed citizens who were not in sympathy with the anti-imperialist propaganda along the old lines.

Mr. Hearst's presidential boom appears to be assuming more serious proportions; not that there is any ground for affirming the probability of his nomination, but that a candidate with his money, political connections and newspaper backing, is not to be despised in a campaign in which there seem to be insuperable obstacles to the nomination of anyone else. The Rhode Island delegation has already been instructed for Hearst, and it is certain that he will find a considerable following in the eastern states. Mr. Hearst owns several newspapers, and he has shown that he knows how to conduct a paper in such a way as to get subscribers. To be sure, his way is the yellow way, but he gets the subscribers, and after all the type of genius which gets subscribers may be closely akin to that which gets votes. The application of yellow journal methods to politics has never been made, at least on a national scale with anything like the thoroughness which would characterize a Hearst campaign for the presidency. We are not saying that it would be altogether a bad thing. The Hearst newspapers are not altogether bad. They get close to the people and give them what they seem to want. The readers of Mr. Hearst's papers give him full credit for every editorial sentiment which they express, and look upon him as the champion of the people against plutocracy. Mr. Hearst is on good terms with Mr. Bryan, and could probably come as near as any one to getting out a full vote of Mr. Bryan's followers.

Russian reports claim that the Japanese forces were defeated in an important battle on the Yalu River and that the Russians took 1,800 prisoners. This is important if true, for a defeat of such magnitude would go far toward checking the advance of the Japanese forces by land. As yet, however, no confirmation of this report has been received, and there are no further details. The dispatches prior to this have brought increasing evidence that the Russians are practically out of Korea except perhaps in the northern part where there have recently been some reinforcements, and that the Russian plan is apparently to make their stand farther back from the coast where the Japanese will have the disadvantage of remoteness from their base of supplies. Russia claims to have 230,000 men between Port Arthur and Harbin. The rumor of the capture of Niuchwang proved to be unfounded, but the Russians are clearly apprehensive that such a step will be taken, for Russia has attempted to enlist both France and Germany in the protection of property at that place. Russian reinforcements are constantly being sent to the front over the Siberian Railway, and General Kuropatkin has left St. Petersburg by the same road to take command of the forces in the east.

The Supreme Task.

Among the unfinished tasks to which we have briefly adverted in this bare outline, there is one which, because of its transcendent importance, and because it was the primary aim of the religious movement concerning which we have been writing, deserves special consideration. It is the unfinished task of promoting the unification of Christians. That task will not be completed, nor that land conquered, until Christ's prayer for the oneness of His followers has been fulfilled.

Fortunately for us and for our fathers, we have received no command from the Lord requiring us to execute this task in a given time. The word of command came to us from Him, as it comes to all who sincerely seek to know and do the will of God—as a deep and abiding conviction of duty—and its vast and revolutionary import was that the existent state of the church was abnormal and contrary to the spirit of the Gospel and to the wish and will of our heavenly Father; that children of a common Father, disciples of a common Lord, heirs of a common salvation, should recognize their oneness in Christ and erect no artificial barriers to separate themselves into warring factions; that, therefore, the supreme need of the time was to organize a movement to be devoted to the advocacy of Christian union on a broad, scriptural basis, devised not by human but by divine wisdom, as the ground of fellowship and co-operation between the followers of Christ.

It was not given to the originators of the movement, nor to us, to know what would be the ultimate result of such an effort. No doubt the immediate results have far surpassed their expectations. And yet they and their spiritual descendants have been more concerned that they be found "obedient to the heavenly vision" than they have been about results. It is a matter of profound congratulation that so remarkable a change has come over the religious world touching its attitude toward the subject of Christian union. At first it was derided as impracticable, undesirable and even wicked to attempt to disturb the denominational status quo. Later, it might be desirable enough but it was impracticable; and many, it must be confessed, have not yet gotten beyond that view of the subject. But the leading minds of Christendom, representing all the religious bodies, recognize what a source of weakness our divisions are, in confronting the problem of evangelizing the heathen world, and in securing needed moral and social reforms in the limits of Christendom. The efforts now being made, and not without success, to lessen the number of these rival denominations by effecting a union between those most alike, show the present trend of thought on that subject.

But gratifying as this change has been to the friends of Christian union, we must not conclude that the battle for Christian union has been fought and won. Much remains yet to be done before our Lord shall see of the travail of His soul, as respects the realization of His prayer for unity, and be satisfied. If it were the will of God that we inaugurate this plea for unity, it is no doubt His will that we carry it on, wisely and persistently, until it shall have accomplished that whereunto it has been sent. There will be adaptations, readjustments, change of emphasis, as new conditions and new problems arise, but the end should be kept steadfastly in view, and no course pursued that does not look to that end and aim.

If we should be asked to state what yet remains to be accomplished before the church shall have attained that unity which the New Testament teaches, we would mention the following steps:

1. The frank and hearty recognition, on the part of all religious bodies, that Christ desires, and that it is the duty of His disciples to seek to bring about, such a visible and practical unity among themselves as will remove the scandal of schism from Christ's church, and hasten the conversion of the world.

2. The grateful recognition, on the part of all Christians, of the unity that already exists in faith and fundamental doctrines, and the utmost readiness of all to utilize this unity in all practicable ways of co-operation looking to common ends.

3. The willingness to put Christ at the center and unite in Him, taking as our motto: "Loyalty to Christ, liberty in Christ, union upon Christ and service for Christ." In a word, the readiness to accept Christ's method of union, as well as to share His desire for union.

4. The disposition on the part of all Christian teachers and molders of religious thought to subordinate their denominational pride and party interests to the higher claims of the kingdom of God and to the unity of Christ's body.

5. And then, the clearness of vision to discern in what things we must be of "the same mind and the same judgment," and in what things we may differ in opinion without marring our Christian unity and fellowship.

That all this implies growth in grace as well as in the knowledge of the truth, is very evident. We must recognize that fact and not be too impatient with men, nor too easily discouraged, if they move more slowly than we think they ought to move toward the goal of a united church. But we who hasten the glorious consummation must not only teach the doctrine of unity; we must manifest the spirit of unity, and furnish an object lesson to the world showing the beauty and benefits of unity. Who is equal to these things? May God give us an appreciation of our high calling and richly endow us with His Spirit that we may walk worthy of the same, "with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; giving diligence to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

The Desire for Union.

The first step toward getting Christian union is to want it. The most perfect possible plan of union, even the divine plan, will not avail to unite Christians who do not desire union and who think they see overwhelming advantages in maintaining the present divided condition of the church. It is for this reason that there is a positive value even to the most visionary and abortive efforts to re-unite. They at least testify that there is a growing desire for union on the part of the leaders of religious thought in all denominations. Everything which fosters this desire is to be encouraged, for it is the fulfillment of the first great condition without which Christian union is impossible of realization.

For several years work has been in progress upon the great Simplon tunnel which will pierce the principal chain of the Alps and connect the upper Rhone Valley with the sunny slopes that go down toward Italy. The interesting point about it is that they began at both ends and that the bore will be complete when the two shafts meet in the heart of the mountain. It has been discovered that this is the only proper way to dig a long tunnel. And it is the only way to successfully tunnel through the barriers of sectarianism. There must be digging on both sides of the wall. This does not mean that union is to be reached by compromise, but that the divinely appointed basis of union (which we believe that we know already) will not be generally accepted and adopted until it is discovered by each religious body as the result of a search growing out of a very eager and ardent desire for union.

In a recent sermon published in the Brooklyn Eagle, M. E. Harlan presented a series of questions and the answers which he had received to them from a number of ministers of national reputation representing various religious bodies. The answers are so cheering to those of us who are committed to the advocacy of union, that we cannot refrain from publishing some of them:

1. Do you believe the present divisions of Christendom into sects and often into hostile camps is according to the Lord's plan or desire and in harmony with Jesus' prayer, John 17:21?

Answers: "No."—Dr. Amory H. Bradford (Congregationalist). "No."—Dr. Kerr B. Tupper (Baptist). "It certainly is not!"—Dr. S. D. McConnell (Episcopalian). "No, emphatically!"—Dr. Tunis S. Hamlin, Washington, D. C. "No, no, no! and no sort of honest interpretation can make it so."—Dr. Allen McNeill, Ridgefield Park, N. J. "I do not."—Dr. G. A. Nunnally (Baptist).

2. What are the advantages or disadvantages to the cause of Christ in being thus divided?

Answers: "Incalculable disadvantages."—"There is no advantage. It is contrary to Christ's wish or command. It renders the church impotent."—"No advantages. Pagans are unable to see what Christianity is or what sect represents it."—"Whatever advantages there may have been years ago, I can see none now. The disadvantages are apparent to every man who thinks."—"No advantages except perhaps a greater zeal; but, it being narrow and sectarian, is sinful and selfish. The disadvantages are numerous—conflicts, confusion, contradictions."

2. What would be the advantage gained through Christian union, especially on heathen fields?

Answers: "Could then act as one man."—"In sentiments of love; in comity of plan."—"Never will the world be won to Christ by a divided Christendom. Christian union on heathen fields and home fields would mean an immense saving of money and men and an immense increase of power."—"Co-operation, economy, power, resulting in the conversion of the heathen."

The religious world—thank God!—is rapidly escaping from the era of preposterous twaddle about the "many regiments (denominations) making up one great army under one commander and marching against one common foe." It is generally admitted that any scheme of military organization which permitted as much cross-firing among the various regiments of an army as is constantly carried on among the several denominations, would be not the terror of its foes, but the laughing-stock of nations.

The movement for union between the Presbyterians (North) and the Cumberland Presbyterians has given occasion for many comments of an entirely admirable sort on the general subject of union and on the smaller subject of union within the various disrupted denominational groups. One of the best of these is a sermon by Dr. William H. Leavell (Presbyterian) of Houston, Tex., published in full in the Houston Daily Post. On the general subject of union, he says:

While I am oppressed with the enormous difficulty of effecting a general unification of Christendom, I believe, nevertheless, that it would be of incalculable value should the numberless fractions of the church forget their differences and unite upon the great essentials of faith. Looking upon the unhappy divisions of Christendom, it is with a certain sense of shame that I remember the beautiful prayer of our Lord while He stood under the shadow of Gethsemane and Calvary: "Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe in Me through their word; that they may also be one; even as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be in Us; that the world may believe that Thou didst send Me. And the glory which Thou hast given Me I have given unto them; that they may be one, even as We are one; I in them, and thou in Me, that they may be perfected into one; that the world may know that Thou didst send Me, and lovest them, even as Thou lovest Me." One can scarcely know other than a feeling of humiliation in contemplating the manner in which this beautiful prayer has been answered by the church. For no one can suppose that the very mild and very fragile sense of union mutually held by the different fragments of the church catholic even approximates a fulfillment of this prayer of our Lord. On the contrary, the wicked and often absurd littleness for the sake of which organic Christianity is broken into so many modern fractions is the saddest possible commentary on the popular view of the oneness which ought to characterize the church.

It may be that our Lord did not hope that all His disciples of every nation and era would be gathered into one ecclesiastical organization, but He surely did not mean that the church should be broken into a hundred fragments and that each fragment should claim for itself the dignity of being the "only true and apostolic church," for He was and is a lover of order.

I am not sure that we can now know His exact meaning, but when He prayed for the oneness of His followers I do not think He contemplated that the present fragmentary condition of the modern church would be an adequate answer to His prayer.

For myself, I am perfectly willing to recognize any one of these sober and worthy and useful, although unnecessary and unhappy fractions, of the great Christian unit as a part of the church, but I do stick at the demand to acknowledge any one of them by way of eminence or exclusiveness to be "the church," or "the Christian church," and thus incontinently dispose of the right of the Presbyterian church to share in that distinction.

Constituted as we are, we must see things differently and yet may be perfectly honest in it all. In a brief instrument like the constitution of the United States there seems to be room and ground for the most diverse interpretations by equally able and equally honest men. How much more natural for honest and able men to differ in their construction of the divine philosophy revealed in many documents of great variety of method and style, written by different men in different countries and different ages. To denounce one another as fools or knaves because we do not see alike is childish and wicked.

Let the churches receive this word, "Other sheep I have, not of this fold." "He that is not against us is for us," and go to emphasizing the things about which they agree, and they will soon find themselves agreeing in many things about which they now differ. Instead of erecting standards of orthodoxy as tests of Christian character, let them admit to their communion, as we do, all who give evidence of personal loyalty to Jesus Christ, and it will take no long time to bring into real union all those of whatever name who "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God."

Now this is not the end of the whole matter, with regard to Christian union, and it does not imply that the men who make these admirable statements have nothing more to learn on the subject, but it does indicate that they are so far in love with the idea of Christian union and desirous of promoting it that they are well on the road to learning more about it.

This growing desire for union on the part of the best men in all denominations indicates not that the work of the Disciples of Christ is done or that the necessity for our plea is superseded, but that the period of our greatest work is just beginning. If we really hold the key to the union question and the religious world is now really wanting to pass through that door, now is the day of our opportunity. If they want union and we know how they may get it, and that on the only possible, practical or scriptural basis, how vastly important does it become for us to deliver our message clearly and persuasively.

We must preach Christian union more. We must live Christian union more. We must set forth the divinely authorized basis of union, and must call upon men to accept it, not as our plea, but as Christ's plea. And while we are telling people how to unite, we must not act in a way which will destroy their desire for union. How much our movement has had to do with producing the present widespread desire for union, no one can tell. Doubtless a great deal. However that may be, the work now before us is of yet greater importance—to point the way to unity without violating the spirit of unity.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Down on the Biscayne.

The sun rose over the bay this morning behind thick clouds, as they seemed, which obscured his face for an hour. But he kept shining all the same, and in a little while the clouds, which proved to be only the vapors of the night, vanished, leaving him a clear path through the skies. Do not be cast down in spirit because clouds of difficulty obscure your way. Shine right on, and sooner or later the clouds will drift away or descend in refreshing showers. Walking down to the bay this morning early, we were interested in watching a large pelican breakfasting on fish. His manner of catching the fish beats the hook-and-line method out of sight. Sailing around and looking down into the clear waters of the bay until he had selected his victim, he fell like a thunderbolt, dashing against the water with a splash and a sound which could be heard a great distance, and rarely missing his mark, as he always sat on the water and swallowed his fish, and then was away for another. These fish come into the shallow water to feed, early in the morning, and the shrewd pelican makes his breakfast hour synchronize with that of the fish. Alas! the pelican is not the only bird or beast or man of prey that makes the necessities of his fellows the occasion for satisfying his own greed!

Our little neighborhood here on the Bay is rapidly filling up with people of literary and scientific attainments. We have already spoken of Dr. John Gifford, author of "Practical Forestry" and ex-professor of Forestry in the School of Forestry in Cornell, who is clearing a piece of land and planting a grove here. Next to him, Dr. De Garmo, professor of pedagogy in Cornell, has bought a tract and is preparing to put it in cultivation. Yesterday there dined with us at Mrs. Haden's three distinguished gentlemen interested in horticulture, among whom was Mr. Van Deman, formerly head of the pomological department at Washington, and who is an expert in fruit-raising, who is about to purchase one hundred acres in this neighborhood to put in pomelo or the grape-fruit. He predicts a great development of this country, and his selection of grape-fruit as the fruit for this section of the state is a scientific pointer by which others will profit, though the best-informed people here had already reached that conclusion. For early tomatoes, potatoes, cabbage, cucumbers and other vegetables, this section possesses many advantages, and many of the "truckers," as they are called, are making good money this season. At the Dade County fair last week in Miami, there was a fine display of horticultural and vegetable products.

We are off for Jacksonville to-night, and these paragraphs are written on the way. From Jacksonville we hope to go via the St. John's River, the Oklawaha, and rail to Tampa, on the west side. When they get that ditch dug across the peninsula, according to the bill now pending before Congress, it will offer additional facilities for crossing from the East Coast to the Gulf. This channel would not only benefit Florida, but would greatly shorten the line of navigation from eastern ports to Galveston, New Orleans and other southern ports. The bill ought to be passed and the canal dug. This is an age of union. The different parts of the world and the different sections of our country are constantly getting closer together by removing natural barriers and by more rapid inter-communication. This is the same principle that is manifesting itself in the religious world in efforts looking to unification. The unity of the race, the brotherhood of man, the breaking down of barriers, the drawing together of those who call Jesus Lord and Master, and the bringing of the whole world into closer neighborhood, are some of the great truths and tendencies of our day.

In turning our backs upon Cocoanut Grove, after a five weeks' delightful sojourn there, we carry with us pleasant memories of the charming place and its excellent people. The features of the place that have left an indelible impression on our minds are the beautiful bay, with its sailing vessels, the green banks of mangroves that line parts of its shore, the tall, stately royal palm, the fruitful cocoanut palm, the brown-barked pines with their green tufts of foliage at their tops, the level savanna with the lights and shadows playing over it, the liquid notes of the mocking birds which make the morning and evening musical with their concerts, the bloom and fragrance of the orange, pomelo, lemon and lime, and over all as blue as sky as arches the fair shores of Italy. No pictures can do more than very imperfectly represent some of these features. To Mrs. Haden, our hostess, especially; to Dr. and Mrs. Gifford; to Miss Lillian, the school teacher; to the Hobbes, to Mr. and Mrs. Kirk Munroe, and others we are indebted for much of the social enjoyment, and for many marks of kindness. We anticipate with pleasure a return to these pleasant scenes and associations.

The Three-Fold Work.

The work of the church may properly be said to consist of three parts: missions, education and benevolence. There is no occasion for saying that any one of these is more important than another. For each is a divinely appointed work committed to us by the hands of God Himself. Jesus was a preacher, a missionary; He was a teacher; He was a philanthropist, moved by a profound sympathy with human suffering, and giving much of His time and strength to the alleviation of the bodily ills of men. Similarly in the apostolic church these three departments of work were recognized. Paul was not only a great preacher and missionary, but a great teacher as well, and when he urged liberality, it was in the interest of the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem.

The Disciples of Christ have in the last few years begun to do tardy justice to the cause of benevolence. It is safe to say that more money has been given by the Disciples of Christ to this cause, through our own channels during the past five years, than in all the preceding years of our history. This is encouraging, but it is not enough. We must cease to regard it as a superfluity and must learn to regard it as one of the necessities of the Christian life. At present no provision is made in our calendar for the observance of a day of benevolence. We hate to encourage a further multiplication of special days, but if we are committed to that system as the best possible way of presenting the various interests to our churches and securing contributions for them from the rank and file of the membership, then surely some provision ought to be made for this work. Perhaps it cannot be done without a general re-adjustment of our calendar. Meanwhile we do not hesitate to suggest, as we have done before, that any church which feels disposed to make an offering on Easter Sunday for the support of the orphans, the aged and the afflicted, will be doing something which need not in the least interfere with the sentiment or the impressiveness of the most beautiful Easter service.

Christian Union.

All views of Christian union may be classified under four heads. First, the historic Episcopate as presented by the Protestant Episcopal Church. This view has received no support worth mentioning from other denominations, except the Episcopal. Second, the view of the Baptists as presented by their national conventions. This is what might be termed the denominational or compromise view. Thus the Congregational, Protestant Methodist and United Brethren are compromising their differences and trying to become one brotherhood. These churches have come nearest to making a success of denominational Christian union. Third, the interdenominational view, such as uniting the seventeen Methodist bodies into one, or the twelve Presbyterian bodies, or the seventeen Lutheran bodies into one large denomination. The Northern Presbyterians and the Cumberland Presbyterians are about to effect such a union. We find, however, that none of these views of Christian union are of any great value except so far as they show a tendency in the right direction, and aid in educating the people for something better. Fourth, the scriptural basis for Christian union. This is sometimes compared with the first and second mentioned above, but when carefully considered these are no more alike than the doctrine of passive conversion among the denominations and active conversion among the Disciples of Christ. The one is men uniting upon some basis they may agree upon by various compromises among themselves, the other is uniting upon what the book of God positively teaches. But who is to decide what the word of God is and what it teaches? Not the Disciples. They have never presumed to do so. Our colleges and leading ministry have accepted the consensus of the Christian scholarship of the world on this question. Whatever the great scholars of Protestantism unitedly declare to be the word of God is accepted as the true basis for Christian union among the Disciples of Christ. We have no time to call attention here to the vast differences between the teaching of the great scholars of the Bible and the formulated creeds of their denominations. This is an immense study in itself, and to state it is sufficient. All recognize this fact. Should the conclusions upon which the scholarship of the great denominations are united, and should their teaching be substituted for the human creeds of the denominations, Christian union would be an established fact among all those who love and serve the Lord on the basis now presented by the Disciples of Christ. We therefore do not ask the denominations to accept our plea or our views of Christian union, but the views that their own scholars have put into our hands and hearts, and which we have found to be in harmony with the word of God.

We have many ministers among us who seem to think that we cannot attain the extraordinary growth necessary to restore Christian union by attracting the members of other churches to our own position and adding them to our numbers. This is not at all necessary. The one thing needful is to preach Christ in such a way as to remove all human creeds and human names. When these are laid aside other differences will adjust themselves. If the gospel is faithfully preached it is only a question of time when congregation after congregation will be ready to become Christians only.

What Is Left?

By Judge A. E. Wilkinson

What remains to us of the Christ of the gospel, after criticism has done its worst upon the records of his life and teachings? Granting the critics their premises—reasoning from the standpoint of fact which they furnish us, must the Savior take his place among the myths and dreams for the past—most beautiful of myths, most ideal of dreams, but no solid basis for faith, devotion or hope? Is there still left us any substantial foundation for belief in the Christian religion?

The views here presented are based upon a conviction that the critical and skeptical attacks upon the New Testament writings have not materially increased the difficulties in the way of accepting the claims of Jesus. From one point of view, which I will not now stop to explain, they may have made such belief easier. Granting that we should accept the conclusions of the critical school, that we have no narrative by an eye-witness of a single one of the miracles which Christ is said to have performed, it may be still shown that the grounds of belief are not affected thereby. This is an attempt to state on what evidence Christianity has really gained our assent in the past, and to show that such evidence remains wholly untouched by criticism.

If our narrative comes not to us at first hand, but is a mere compilation, made perhaps a century or more after the events, of the traditions current among Christ's followers about his life and teachings, its probative value, and the proof of Christianity, so far as it rests on the credibility of that narrative, are seriously shaken. The evidences of Christianity have been usually treated as though the main or only foundation for a belief in the claims of its Founder to command our allegiance was the sufficiency of the testimony of the evangelists to establish the fact that he possessed more than human powers. It was thought, apparently, that we must first prove Christ's miraculous power, in order to believe in him, and that if the testimony was insufficient to support belief in the miracles, all our grounds of belief had failed us. To show, then, that the Gospels were not written by eye-witnesses of the facts narrated, nor by cotemporaries of Christ, seemed, both to believers and skeptics, to promise the downfall of the church. Our evidence, which we thought came from personal knowledge, appeared to be mere hearsay.

The real difficulty in the way of belief lay back of that, being not so much whether this, as whether any ordinary human testimony would suffice for the task. The miracles have always been rather an obstacle than a help to our belief in the claims of Jesus. Let us frankly admit that they offer special obstacles in the present age. Increasing knowledge of the order of Nature has brought us, more and more, to think of the world as under the reign of inexorable law. The idea of interference with that law by any mere volition becomes constantly more repugnant to our habits of thought—alien to our point of view and state of mind.

Whatever may be thought of the logical soundness of the theory as to the insufficiency of human testimony to establish a miracle, that theory to which we usually attach the name of its great advocate, Hume, it is reasonably certain that it is one that we act upon without much hesitation in other matters than those of religion. We cannot get through the world with any degree of moral and intellectual comfort without interposing some such buffer against the shock of a thousand attacks upon our credulity.

We look back with astonishment and contempt upon the days when human beings were solemnly tried and punished for witchcraft, though their guilt was apparently proven by the sworn testimony of credible witnesses. It is not at all certain that such testimony would not now be forthcoming, if there could be found a tribunal which would have the patience to listen to it. We don't hang witches to-day (witchcraft is, perhaps, still a crime at common law), not because it is impossible, though it is doubtless harder, to find testimony to prove it, but because incredulous judges and jurors have absolutely closed their ears against evidence on that subject. But there still remains abundance of testimony to the marvelous against which we must be compelled to shelter ourselves under a more or less courteous skepticism. What are we to say to the affidavits of respectable citizens and detailed narratives of newspaper reporters which a few years since heralded the cures of Schlatter and other "divine healers?" How shall we dispose of our friends the "Spiritualists" who are constantly standing ready to overwhelm us with signs and marvels? If the actual exhibition of them disappoints our inquiry, we may be sure that every deficiency will be made up in the narratives of what others have seen and heard. How shall we deal with Professor Crookes and the venerable Alfred Russell Wallace, with their mechanical tests of the powers of "mediums" whom we still agree to regard as vulgar fakirs? What of the Society for Psychical Research, and its interminable volumes of attested marvels? Above all, what answer can we find when respected friends and neighbors deluge us with tales of the miracles of modern "Christian Science?"

Here is a test ready for convenient use, by which you can determine whether Hume's theory is or is not a part of your practical, every-day equipment for deciding things. You don't believe in "Christian Science." Don't you know the people who bear witness to its marvels of healing? Are they not your neighbors and friends? Are they not often honest, intelligent folks, thoroughly in earnest and anxious to convince you? Can you doubt their sincerity, or explain their facts if you admit them? And yet, do you refuse to listen to them? Do you hear with impatience, and sigh with relief when you have detached from your button-hole the detaining finger of the friend who insists on telling you what he knows about it? Then are you, indeed, an intellectual disciple of David Hume, and it is time you rearranged your evidences of Christianity accordingly.

The simple fact is, that when we come to deal with tales of the supernatural or the marvelous, we have had such experience with the unreliable nature of human testimony, the incompetency of the ordinary observer to correctly discern and to report without exaggeration what passes under his own eyes, the proneness of narrators to leave a story better than they found it the common indifference to accuracy wherever the fact that what is said is not to be somehow and soon practically acted on by the hearer, we become almost ready to conclude that the man who said in haste that all men are liars might well have said it at his leisure.

What are we to do? I have asked. What we do is simply this: we assume an attitude of polite skepticism toward every thing of this sort. We will not take issue, contradict, or dispute. We only smile and pass on. Why should we deal with the narratives of the New Testament in any other spirit than that with which we approach the narratives of the supernatural at the present day?

Now, believers undoubtedly treat the Christian religion and its miracles otherwise than they do other marvels similarly authenticated by human evidence. And they do this, so infidels would claim and we must concede, chiefly because the Christian religion is an established institution, which, by its success, has given some presumptive evidence of its right to exist and to command our submission. To understand how completely this is the case, try to imagine the state of mind with which, if Christ's religion had failed and perished from the earth, an earnest inquirer for truth, who had chanced to reclaim from forgetfulness the narratives of the evangelists and to put himself in possession of all our present knowledge as to their origin and authenticity, would contemplate those narratives as evidence of the truth of the marvels which they relate.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

It is a good thing these days to be well up where the air is pure. Even at this elevation one has had to hold his nose for two weeks past. There were the post office scandals, and now the Smoot inquiry. It is bad down below. Those famous Augean stables had 30,000 oxen in them, and had not been cleaned for thirty years; and Hercules managed to perform the task in a single day by turning the river Alpheus through them. Something of the same drastic treatment is needed to dispose of this Mormon uncleanness which is being stirred up by the Senate Committee.

The Herculean task was begun March 2. President Joseph D. Smith, the highest official of the church, was on the stand and questioned in regard to divine revelations and the prevalence of polygamy. He himself had been visited with inspirations from God, though no angels had come to him as to his distinguished uncle. He subscribed to the standard of authority for the church in relation to the revelation commanding polygamy made to the first president in a visit from "an angel in black," and claimed that he still believed in polygamy. Smith was what the lawyers call "a frank witness." He is a patriarchal-looking man, as becomes one with such a family, and is not unlike ex-Senator Pepper with his wealth of whiskers and other peculiarities. He was born in Missouri in 1838, and went to Utah ten years later. He is "sustained as a prophet, seer and revelator." He declared that God had shown him "by inspiration that Mormonism is God's divine truth." When asked concerning President Woodruff's manifesto in 1890, commanding a suspension of the requirement that polygamy be practiced in the church, he said, "The command did not change my views on the question of plural marriages. I believe plural marriages to be right." He confessed that he was the husband of five wives and the father of forty-two children, and that eleven of his progeny had been born since the manifesto of 1890.

The effort of the prosecution was to show that Senator Smoot is associated with a hierarchy which practices polygamy and connives at violations of the law, and that every vote he may cast is subject to the wish and command of the church, that as a member of that hierarchy he subscribes to vows in conflict with the laws of the land. President Smith declared that since the manifesto there has not been a plural marriage in the church performed by its sanction. Of himself he said: "I had a family—a plural family, if you please. I married my first wife more than thirty-eight years ago, and my last wife more than twenty years ago. By these wives I have had children, and I have preferred to take my own chances with the law and suffer any consequences the law might visit upon me rather than abandon these children and their mothers." One of the Senators asked if he had married any wives between the first and the last that he mentioned. "I have," said he. "How many?" "Three." "Then you have five wives now." "That is correct." "How many children have you had since the manifesto of 1890?" he was asked. "Eleven since 1890. Each of my five wives have borne me children." "Since that time?" "Since that time," he repeated. "I rather think that one of them has had three children. I could tell you a little later." His doubt about the matter caused some amusement on the part of the grave gentlemen of the Senate. When pressed to say whether his allegiance was to law or so-called revelation, he reluctantly admitted he would try to obey the law. "I obey the law so far as teaching is concerned. I have not said that I have obeyed the law in my practice." Senator Hoar wanted to know—don't you know?—and so kept asking questions. The Senator drew his New Testament on the Mormon leader. He said it was stated "a bishop shall be sober, the husband of one wife"—"At least one wife," Mr. Smith interrupted. "Well, we don't construe it that way in our church," said the Massachusetts Senator, and his colleagues laughed. "What I want to get at is this. I know several bishops in our church who are bachelors. Do you regard it a divine command that the bishops shall have one wife or more?" How much that sounds like some querrists in our religious papers! "I believe," said Smith, "the practice of polygamy was general among the Jews at the time the Scriptures were written. I believe it was commanded that a bishop should be a married man because his duties made it necessary that he should be an experienced man." "What would you do?" asked the same inquisitive Yankee, "if the revelation conflicted with the law? Which would you obey?" "With me, perhaps the revelation would be uppermost," Smith was saying. "Can you say 'perhaps' to such a question?" asked the Senator severely. "Suppose you received a revelation commanding your people to do something which would conflict with the law of the land. Which would they have to obey?" "Whichever they pleased. There would be no compulsion." Then the president read from one of the Mormon standards of authority: "Let no man break the law of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the law of the land." "Which would you do?" he was asked. "I would strive with all my might to obey the laws of the land."

When crowded as to his duty to the law, the Mormon president declared: "It is to the laws of Utah that I am answerable; it is the law of my state that has the right to punish me. The courts of Utah are of competent jurisdiction. Congress has no business to interfere with my private affairs. It has no right to pry into my marriage relations and call me to account. The church gave me my wives, and I do not think the church could be consistent in taking them." "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away," said Senator Bailey. "It appears that polygamous cohabitation is forbidden by both the law of the land and the law of the church as laid down in the Woodruff manifesto. Then as the head of the church you are violating the law of the land and the ordinances of the church as well." "Not the ordinances," said Smith. "Well, the law then." "No, the rule," said the witness. "The rule, after all, is the law for conduct," said the Texan, "and it appears that both the rule of the church and the law of the land forbade polygamous cohabitation, and you, as the head of the church, violated both." "I will not quarrel with the Senator about that." "How could you better teach polygamy than by practicing it?" the Michigan man, Mr. Burrows, wanted to know. "I am not practicing polygamy. I am practicing polygamous cohabitation, which is not polygamy. Polygamy is plural marriage, and I have taken no plural wives since the manifesto of 1890." Just then the photographer came in with his big camera. The two most important things with every gathering in Washington is first to be photographed, and secondly, call on the President.

President Smith testified that only three or four per cent of the Mormons were living in polygamy. Senator Dubois put in statistics to show there was about 23 1-4 per cent of the Mormon population of age actually living in polygamy in 1890, and contended there had been no material reduction in the number since that time. Reed Smoot became an apostle in 1890. Smith was asked when his last child was born, and said it was the day Smoot became an apostle. "Then so far as you and Mr. Smoot are concerned, you were in harmony," remarked the Michigan Senator. "I gave my consent to his becoming a candidate for Senator," he said later, "because it is a rule that any one of the general authorities of the church desiring to engage in any business outside of his church duties, must get the consent of the first presidency and the twelve apostles before he can do so." When pressed to give the number and names of his children since 1890, the witness protested vigorously, but finally gave the list: "By Juliana—Edith and Rachel; by Sarah—Asenath

The Dust of His Feet By Frank Waller Allen

Near a mile and a half from the old village of Ghent, in the Ohio river bottom, there abides a little white farmhouse where the fertile meadows of Abner Meek meet the wooded hills of William Beech. Abner's fields, stretching their fruitfulness of grain and verdure away to the river, are cut into two nearly equal parts by the white, dusty turnpike, that wriggles with the river from one bit of a town to another. But the hillsides of William Beech, covered mostly with the great, spreading trees bearing his own name, bore principally, besides the trees, a good quality of tobacco and a quantity of thin, flat rocks worn round and smooth by the rains of many years.

It is well that these rocks, some of which are merely a foot in diameter, while much larger ones are as many as three, be remembered. For it was during an hour at noon, while Beech's two sons were idling away the few moments of rest in the shade of their little white-washed cabin-home, perched half-way up the hill, that the interesting amusement of rolling the miniature boulders down toward the fields below occurred. Not that the boys meant harm. They were perfectly innocent. In fact, they did not think for a moment of any serious results. And when a huge rock bounded down the hill-side toward Abner Meek's corn, not quite old enough to cease plowing, with a velocity that tore down a worm fence and uprooted some half-dozen hills of corn, they were still guileless, for the youths had turned their backs to seek more stones of the proper roundness and weight. In fact, it was not until Abner Meek's hen house was demolished most completely, and one huge rock had carried away part of the summer kitchen, that the boys realized the serious mischief they had done. Then, so busy were they, their folly might have remained a mystery to them still, had not a small piece of lead from Abner's long, brass-trimmed rifle stirred the dust near the family door-step. The boys retreated immediately. And after a few more harmless shots from the old-time ranger, the valley was again quiet in the heat of a mid-summer noon.

William Beech was an outlander of the usual type found upon the land of the large farm owners of Kentucky. The hillside which he tenanted really belonged to Meek, but for a dozen years or more this man of many children and no acres had been feeding his brood by raising tobacco and giving one-fifth of the crop to his landlord for the use of the soil.

His family was large in number, and so closely one after the other had they come, that had they been stood in a row, the littlest the highest on the hill and the next youngest a space below, they easily would have formed a straight line of eleven bits of youthful humanity from the head of the twenty-year-old boy to the bit of a girl, scarcely two, at the other end of the line. Of course, the hill-side was steep.

Beech, himself, was as lean as his larder, and his body was almost as bare of clothing as his floors of carpets. Almost, I say, for the good man was the possessor of some blue jeans trousers and cotton shirts. The floors were bare.

The few acres that served for the annual crop of tobacco, if you remember correctly, are almost cut off from the outer world, except by the lane leading through the farm of Abner Meek. Behind it is the cliff towering straight toward the sky for some thirty or forty feet, before rounding off into a pretty hill-top. To either side stretches the farm-land of other folk, whose acres bore crops through which they would bear no trespassing. Consequently, otherwise than through Meek's lane, the outlander's family had no recourse than to remain at home should that outlet be closed to them.

The two families had always been neighborly. When the toiler on the hill had brought his wife to the then newly built cabin years ago, the man of the valley had helped his tenant to haul the huge flat stone that formed the very doorstep to the house and place it in position. It had come off the Meek farm, and surely the man who gives you the very threshold to your home must be of the stuff good neighbors are made of.

Therefore, when a few days after the rock rolling and the response from the farm below, the Beeches were forcibly made aware of the fact that the Meeks were patrolling the dividing line, and threatened to put to sleep with a bit of lead the Beech that dared to throw his leg over the division fence—for the gate was nailed up—there was a deal of consternation in the little home on the hill-side.

The boys had first tried passing the lane that they might go to town; but they returned home with the tale of a closed passage-way and a peep down the barrel of a muzzle-loading shotgun, in the hands of Elviry Meek.

Then the elder Beech, with a look of anger and a manner, savoring of strong determination, strutted leisurely down the hill with his ax upon his shoulder. He went toward the gate. No man was going to shut him in! He'd brain 'em if need be! But when he returned a half-hour later, with a small, round hole through the crown of his buckeye hat, no ax and decidedly out of breath, the matter really began to look serious.

When the crop of tobacco on the hill-side waxed and grew strong, the old man and his sons spent the long summer days hoeing and removing suckers and worms from the plants.

The heat was intense, and it was frequently necessary to seek the spring that had its source near the foot of the hill, to cool their dusty throats. But no one ventured near the worm-fence that separated the pastures of Abner Meek from the tobacco patch on the hill-side. It must be admitted that the plants nearest the fence were sorely neglected, for more than once had the old man, becoming bold, ventured near and had a peep down a muzzle-loader for his pains.

The family had suffered some for want of little necessities that can be secured only from the village store;

DOCTOR DID IT

Put on 36 lbs. by Food.

Feed a physician back to health and he gains an experience that he can use to benefit others. For this reason Grape-Nuts food is daily recommended to patients by hundreds of physicians who have cured themselves of stomach trouble. One doctor says:

"Although a physician and trying to aid and assist my fellow-beings to enjoy good health, it must be admitted I formerly did not enjoy the best of health myself. In January, 1899, I only weighed 119 pounds. At this time I was living in the Ohio valley and began to think I had about seen my best days. One day about 3 years ago I had an opportunity to try Grape-Nuts food for my breakfast. I liked it so well that I ate three teaspoonfuls three times a day and have regularly used it up to the present time, and I now weigh 155, a gain of 36 pounds, and enjoy the best of health.

"Not only has Grape-Nuts made this wonderful change in me but through it I have helped my friends, relatives and patients. The sustaining power of this food is simply wonderful.

"I have one patient who is a section hand on the C. & O. R. R. who eats nothing in the morning but four tablespoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and yet does his very hard work up to lunch time and enjoys the best of health and strength.

"I could name a great many cases like this and I still prescribe Grape-Nuts in my practice every day." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ask any physician about the scientific principles on which Grape-Nuts food is made. He'll tell you the principles are perfect.

Then a 10 days' trial proves that the principles are carried out in the food ("all the good of the grains so treated, that anyone can digest it all"). Shown in renewed physical strength and brain energy.

but there were "greens" to be gathered and vegetables from a small garden, even if there was a lack of salt and pepper with which to season them. It was the approaching winter the old man feared. The sickness, the cold and the death that come with winter. Yet he knew there was a possibility that he could slip across the field then in the dead of night and get the law to help him out. He couldn't venture to do so now. Twice he had attempted to slip through the lane at night, but the bull-dog in charge of the premises prevented him.

"Ef I could jes get to town," the old man would say to himself. "I'd see if the law would force Abner Meek to let me an' mine out o' this here place. Bless me, I'd move away and leave the dad-burn hill-side ef I only had a way." But every attempt made was more forcibly repulsed by Meek, until after a while the Beeches gave up in despair. "What ef one o' us was to be taken sick an' die—whar'd we be?" asked the old man of his wife one day. "Ye couldn't burry a snow bird in this hill-side an' expect it to lay kivered up more'n time the first shower come er long."

And sure enough, it was not long before the littlest girl was suffering with croup. Down in his barn below Abner Meek heard the coughing of the baby, and its plaintive cry almost made him relent. The child itself was lying on its back in the sparsely clothed bed, badly in need of a physician.

Abner heard a shout from above, and then Beech's voice, pleading that he might be allowed to go for a doctor. He even heard it from the dividing fence where the father had ventured for the sake of his child. Then the mother called him to return. Next day the child was better, and in a few days the man in the valley saw her at play about the door as usual. He was glad, for his heart began to ache sorely and recall memories of a tiny grave in his own garden kept green by a mother's care for more than twenty years.

Later in the year, when the frosts began to turn the broad leaves of the tobacco into a yellow and then deep brown, it came time to cut the crop. It was then hung on stakes in the field to ripen thoroughly. Shortly after this, the toiler conscientiously marked off a generous fifth of his crop and wondered how he was to get it down to his exacting master. However, the problem was solved for him. A few days later he watched the man below unchain the gate and drive into the field or tobacco. There were three wagons and some half-dozen negro farm hands with him. But, to the consternation of Beech, Meek did not go to the part of the field to which his portion of the crop was allotted, but, instead, began hauling of the entire crop. Beech rushed down the hill, regardless of results, and ventured to ask an explanation, but the click of a rifle caused him to stop. The sight of a gun at the shoulder of each occupant of the tobacco patch, with a barrel pointing menacingly toward him, changed his mind. He stalked slowly back up the hill, sat down in the shade of his forlorn home and watched Abner Meek haul his entire crop from the field and store it in the huge barns below. When the field was empty, save of worthless stalks, and the lowering sun found his bent figure, Beech rose and staggered into the house where twelve hungry mouths were waiting for food. He turned and looked at the full barns below. Three huge structures filled with corn, wheat and tobacco—his tobacco. And his children crying for bread! Reaching to a shelf over the door, he took down a worn book—the only one he had ever possessed. Turning idly through its pages as if seeking to find fitting passages for his comfort, he read:

"And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily, I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city."

"I'll do it," he murmured. "When I get away from here I'll even wash off this yaller clay, if the Lord be willin' an' never git this dirt on me again. That passage don't necessarily refer to a city no more'n he meant Abner Meek when he says, 'Blessed 'er the Meek.'"

Just how late it was that night when he was awakened from his sleep, Beech never knew. But he realized it was some time between midnight and dawn. It was very dark, but as he turned over, wide awake, he saw a shadow flickering on the window. Rising to his feet, he gazed toward the valley, and there from Abner Meek's central barn a tiny flame licked from the open mouth of the hay loft. He rushed toward the door and, at the same time, called his boys. But he knew that the whole thing could burn before any of them could reach it. Stopping just without his door he shouted lustily for Meek, but no one stirred from the cottage below. The boys were rushing down the hill, but the old man knew that the barn would burn with its stock and crops if the farmer and his men did not rescue what they might. He yelled frantically for a moment. Then, as if inspired by a thought, he turned and with almost superhuman strength, lifted the huge boulder that formed his threshold from its place. Balancing it a moment, he aimed it toward the Meek homestead, and sent it thundering down the hillside. The great rock whirled and leaped from boulder to boulder, plunging through earth and trees like a fleeing monster pursued to death. Finally it crashed through the dividing fence, and then for a second time a boulder started down the hill by a Beech tore away Abner Meek's summer kitchen. But the means justified the end, for it brought out the farmer and his men; and during it all William Beech sat in his doorway, far above, and watched his sons work to save the property of his oppressor. He wrenched his back lifting the boulder and was unable to go down himself, but upon his face there was a smile born of a loving heart and gentle soul.

Pruning a crab-apple tree will increase the crop of sour apples, but if you want sweet fruit you must graft in the old stock a saccharine variety. You cannot substitute morality for religion. A new principle produces the fruits of righteousness. Morality prunes; religion engrafs.—Ram's Horn.

GRAND WIFE

The Kind Worth Having.

A well-known lady of Carthage, Mo., says: "Although I do not drink tea or coffee myself I have had a most interesting experience in my family for about a year ago my husband began to fail in health. He would get so very nervous at times he would have to give up his work and come home. His eyes were failing him and the doctor became alarmed—was afraid he was going to lose his sight. He also got very yellow in complexion, at times his blood ran cold, from nervous chills the doctor said.

"In a few days he would return to work still in that dull, chilly condition. He would drink coffee, coffee, coffee, 'for a stimulant' he would say (as he drank no liquor.)

"His condition gradually got worse instead of better until finally I made up my mind coffee had something to do with it, so I bought a package of Postum without telling him, and made it according to directions. He drank it and seemed to like it so I continued to make it, and before the first package was gone he began to get so clear of complexion and feel so well, gaining fast in flesh, he was so delighted he would get weighed every day.

"Finally he talked so much about it (he had gained 10 pounds in 10 days) I could not keep it a secret any longer and told him to give Postum the credit. The consequences are there has been no more coffee in the house since (and no doctor either.)

"Postum is a delightful drink made according to directions, I have found no better way as it is a rich golden brown when cream is added.

"I forgot to say my husband's eyes are as strong as they ever were, he is well and hearty, does not sit around the stove chilled all the time as he did before." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Coffee poison causes eye trouble in many cases as well as other ails, and is never suspected. A 10 days' trial proves things you will never forget.

Britain As An Oriental Power

By William Durban

It is at this juncture in England's history almost futile to talk with any of our people here on any topic apart from events in the Far East. Vladivostok, Port Arthur, Seoul, Tokyo, and Peking bulk immensely in the interests of the British public. Some absurdities are daily perpetrated. Eager minds cannot wait for the genuine news, and there is a tendency to collective hysteria which demands sensational intelligence whether reliable or fictitious. Not many days before the war broke out, a few weeks since, one of our London morning papers contained a very dogmatic article under the title "Will Japan fight? No." Such rash prophets are very numerous over here, and the surprising thing is that these reckless soothsayers never seem to be aware that they have grossly stultified themselves, nor does the public appear to mind being gulled as long as it has enjoyed a passing diversion.

Foolish Foretelling.

I deeply regret the infatuation of the most popular organs of the British press. All the Tory papers alike, but especially the Times and the Daily Mail, have for some time seemed intensely anxious to stir up the malignant anti-Russian jingoism in the minds of the masses which in the middle of the last century precipitated the dreadful Crimean War. Indeed, the serious question arises whether we are not heading straight for a conflict with the great Slav Power, and my own conviction is that if Russia could secure the co-operation of either Germany or France, she would, at no distant date, launch into a desperate struggle with the British Empire. That such a contest between two mighty powers will eventuate in the future is an approximate certainty. All the signs of the times point to it, though the blind, or at any rate befogged, masses of the unthinking people do not for a moment stop to consider such an instructive topic as the possibility of the future, indicated by these same signs of the present moment. Indeed, I notice that the great majority of the religious editors and contributors are altogether oblivious of the tendencies of events.

It is becoming increasingly evident that Great Britain has for her destiny the control of the Far East. I have before now in these articles alluded to this subject, and I have pointed out that America will be a partner with England in that domination of the Far Orient which cannot be escaped. To that consummation all incidents are contributing, the most astute statesmen and bureaucrats really perceiving nothing of the meaning of what they are doing to bring about the end appointed by Providence. Now, as a sample of the folly of the wild vaticinators, who take on themselves the role of secular prophets, take the following from a London morning paper this very week. A column of the most positively expressed opinion appeared under the heading: "Will Russia break up? Yes!" This is as ridiculous a prediction as the other which I have alluded to, for no writer with any knowledge of Russia would venture to commit himself to such a judgment. Misfortune, defeat, humiliation have been often experienced by Russia, but her disasters have invariably caused the great Empire to pull itself together in the most marvelous manner. So it will be again, and yet again. For there is something in the Slav temperament which defies defeat, and which produces only the most invincible determination to fulfil the predestined mission of "Holy Russia." I shall never forget all that I saw in Russia during the summer when the present Tsar was crowned in Moscow. I spent some time at Nijni Novgorod, the central spot of European Russia, where that year was not only to be seen the usual Great Yarmarka—the world-famous annual fair, which has no equal on earth—but also the immense and wonderful Pan-Slavonic Exhibition. That Exposition amazed all who visited it from outside the Russian Empire. All the exhibits were entirely of Russian production, and they came from every part of the Tsar's dominions. I learned exactly what I have come to realize about America. Russia and the United States resemble each other in one respect and in one only. Each of these countries can exist, if needful, in absolute isolation and independence. Each could be shut off entirely from the whole world outside and comfortably subsist on its own resources. But I take leave to say that Russia even excels America in its potential resources. The Russians were inordinately proud of their exhibition. Its display opened their own eyes to the latent power of their Empire. They can produce any commodity that humanity needs. Their manufactures are of far greater extent and importance than the world generally is aware. The doctrine that Russia is likely to break up is a laughable absurdity. Very much that has looked solid in the Empire will undoubtedly be smashed up, but this gigantic Empire which strides over two Continents will come out of the war, even if defeated, with a resolve which nothing can alter to resume her onward way, and an expectation of victories that Heaven will surely grant to the nation which God is supposed to favor above all others. Defeat and disaster will only have the effect of welding the Empire more closely together. It may produce some kind of revolution, but what then? That would only bring out the undeveloped might of the nation of one hundred and forty millions, just as after the French Revolution France became for a generation all but invincible. Really, our English prophets should be amenable to poor Artemus Ward's counsel, "Never prophesy unless you know!" Perhaps it may seem as if I were doing a bit of prophesying myself; but I am only arguing on the basis of what I have seen and learned, and I cannot help drawing a few inferences from observation.

Britain's Necessary Attitude.

There are some matters on which the national mind of England is unalterably made up. England will never allow any foreign power, especially Russia, to possess Constantinople. Strange to say, England is less likely to prevent a much more dangerous part of Russia's program—the seizure of Jerusalem. The Russian Church is, to all practical intents and purposes, the Russian nation, and the Russian Church has long set its heart on the appropriation of the Holy Places in Palestine. The crowning ambition of the Tsar is to be enthroned in Jerusalem as Emperor of Asia. Britain will not permit Russia to control Southern Persia, though, strange again to say, she will allow the Russian Bear to steal the northern half of the poor Persian Lamb. England will never see Russia intrenched in Afghanistan, as that wild region is politically sacred as an inviolable buffer-territory. England would fight Russia rather than allow her to dominate Tibet. I do not believe that any English politician of any party would wish to see Russia ousted from Manchuria, where her rule must be infinitely preferable to the gross misrule of China; nor do I believe that we should do more than formally protest even if Russia laid hold of Peking, which, however, would give umbrage to Germany. But all England would be in favor of war, if it were needful in order to hold Russia off from the vast basin of the Yang Tse. Central China is actually spoken of by some missionaries from China, with whom I have been conversing, as the "sphere of influence" of England. Thus there is, unfortunately, many a danger point in international diplomacy, so far as Britain and Russia are concerned. I am one of those who think that the destiny of all Anglo-Saxons is bound up in common, and that our Anglo-Saxon Empire will be found in alliance with Anglo-Saxon America, or the United States, when the crisis of the world arrives. True, the population of the United States is very mixed indeed, but it is all being merged into Anglo-Saxon homogeneity. Russia will certainly be infatuated enough to offend America. The great autocratic Imperialism of the East cannot dwell amicably forever in the same world with the great Western Power which must stand as the colossal and inviolable representative of the rights of freedom for all humanity. There will be no escape. The devil of despotism has provided a destiny for Russia and she will go on to her doom; the angel of freedom has marked out a path for Britain and America, and they must march along that track to the inevitable consummation. The Philippine Archipelago in the hands of America is a finger-post pointing along that same way. I have been talking here in London with Dr. Pemtecost, who is now delighting people in London with some of his sermons and lectures. He is vehemently against Russia. Having recently visited China, Korea, Japan, and India, after his long stay in the Philippines, he is fresh from the Far East. He says that he would sew the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack back to back, unfurl the united standards in the face of Russia, and cry, "Thus far, but no farther!" And he declares that Britain and America could and should have prevented this new war by unitedly forbidding Russia to trespass on Korea, and to fulfil her engagements as to Manchuria. But the difficulty is that Britain and America do not know their own minds on some of the most vital issues of the moment, or when they have made up their minds it is too late for the purposes of peace. But the most serious element in contemporary history is this, that Britain and America are both Oriental Powers now, and for supremacy in the Orient they will have to contend with a giant nation which will not recognize obstacles or even submit to the dictates of any temporary defeats.

The Natural Man vs. The Spiritual Man.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—I read with interest your interpretation of 1 Cor. 2:14. Your interpretation was as follows: "Just as art is discerned by some artistic taste or ability, just as music is discerned or interpreted by those possessing musical taste and ability, just as poetry is discerned or understood by one possessing some poetic insight and ability, so the spiritual world and spiritual realities are discerned only by those who are spiritually minded. This is simply a universal law, that runs throughout God's universe."

What you state is certainly true. "The carnally-minded man certainly cannot be enraptured with the Sermon on the Mount, or with the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians." It also follows from this that our appreciation of spiritual things is progressive. As we ascend the mountain, our horizon widens, and new visions of beauty are opened to us; just so in the spiritual world. As we gain the spiritual heights and our lives are being continually transformed into the likeness of the Christ-life, our spiritual horizon widens, old spiritual truths become more clear and significant, and ever and anon some new truth is discovered and explored. To me this is a beautiful and inspiring thought; but does this passage teach this lesson? I think not. Like all other passages, this one must be interpreted in the light of the context. What is the subject which the apostle is discussing?

Beginning with Chap. 1:18, and continuing to the close of the second chapter, the apostle is discussing "the word of the cross," or as Alfred has rendered it, "the doctrine of the cross." He refers to its rejection by the Jews and by the Greeks, and explains why they rejected it.

Chap. 1:22, "Seeing that the Jews ask for signs, and Greeks seek after wisdom." The gospel became a stumbling block to the Jews, because of their incorrect theories about the Christ, and foolishness to the Greeks because they "sought after wisdom," or wanted a philosophical basis for their faith. The apostle admits that God's wisdom is not according to the wisdom of this world (1:25-29). He claims to know and "speak the wisdom of God in a mystery," which wisdom was unknown to those who crucified Christ, that according to revelation eye had not seen (hitherto), nor ear heard, etc., the things God had prepared for them that love him," 2:6-9. He then explains the source of his knowledge of these things. "But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit," 2:10. The competency of the Spirit to make this revelation is also set forth in v. 10. "For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." In 2:11, by a simile, the apostle shows that in no other way except by the revelation given by the Spirit was it possible to obtain this knowledge. He was speaking "not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Spirit teacheth," v. 13. Vs. 14 and 15 read as follows: "Now the natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged. But he that is spiritual, judges (discerns) all things," etc. Now who is the natural man, and why cannot he know the things of the Spirit of God? From the context I conclude that the natural man is the philosophic Greek who sought a faith according to man's wisdom and not according to the Spirit's revelation. He could not know the things of the Spirit of God because he had rejected the only source of such information. His inability to know or discern God's wisdom or plan of salvation was not due to his carnal nature; but to his wrong method of procedure. Even at the present time many carnally-minded men discern the doctrine of the cross. Not that they fully comprehend the doctrine of the atonement. No one can do this. But they do discern that this is God's way of saving the world. The discovery of this truth always precedes regeneration, and is essential to conversion.

The spiritual man, v. 15, as I understand the passage, does not refer to the regenerate as such; but to the man who acknowledges the revelation of the Spirit and proceeds accordingly in his investigation.

I should be glad, indeed, if you or some one else would give this passage renewed study, and let us have the results of your search for truth in a careful exegesis of the same.

Fraternally,

J. G. CREASON.

[We have already given our exegesis of the passage, and are willing to let it stand. As it seems to us, the "spiritual man" is the man in whom the Spirit of God, through revelation and the grace of Christ, has done his regenerating work, so that the man himself has become spiritual. Perhaps others have a different idea.—EDITOR.]

Laborers for the Harvest.

Noting in the last issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Brother Sniff's article as to the need of more preachers, I cannot forbear expressing my heartfelt sympathy with his plea and my joy that this vital phase of our work is being pressed upon the attention of our people more and more.

Knowing what I do, from over seven years pastorate at Angola, of the life and work of Prof. Sniff and his associates in the Tri-State Normal College, I cannot keep from saying some of the things in my heart that press for utterance.

In the first place, I would like to note the fact that Brother Sniff does not speak from a theory. His work is a demonstration. My own acquaintance with more than a score of young men who have gone out from Angola to preach the gospel supports every statement that he makes. The boys came to Angola poor. They were not looking toward a long course of educational work. They had not thought of doing work that would particularly impress the world. They were not, at least in many instances, members of the Christian Church, if identified with any religious work. Under the influence of this preparatory school, however, they did discover themselves, as the president says, and the brotherhood is now enriched by their splendid service. What has been done at Angola, almost without the brotherhood's knowledge, and certainly without the brotherhood's support, could be duplicated in very many sections of the country. If many preparatory schools, operated at comparatively moderate expense and with many other advantages in first laying hold of the young, could be brought to sustain academic relation to fully equipped Bible colleges and universities—the academies themselves providing good introductory Bible courses that would prepare many a man for effective preaching—the end would be the splendid type of ministry for which Prof. Sniff pleads and men for every field.

May the Lord direct us aright as we try to solve the problem with which the article referred to deals. As a people we must find the men and then help the men find themselves if the work of the future is to be done as the fathers have prepared the way. At present, is it not true that we are failing to get down low enough? Are we not too much expecting boys to find themselves and come to us asking permission to prepare for the ministry of the Word? And is not such a thought out of harmony with the Savior's appeal to pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into his harvest?

Some Ancient Wisdom.

For several weeks I have been waiting for an opportunity to second your suggestion that our editors get together and agree, if possible, on several important issues that now divide them. A meeting of that kind might not settle all differences, but it ought to have the effect of putting a milder temper into our discussions. That would be a long step forward.

At the same conference, let the editors agree to be consistent, and not exhort the preacher, with all long-suffering and doctrine, to beware of speculating schemes as though speculating were a deadly sin, while advertising such schemes in their columns. If the advice is intended to make the preacher a shining mark, the advertisement tempts him to become a mining shark. Truly, the trail of the serpent is over us all. Selah.

Church Insurance.

I believe the church is neglecting one very important part of its work by not having some substantial protection for its weak and unfortunate members. We, the membership, nearly all carry some kind of insurance; and a very large per cent are attached in various ways to different orders for the real good they furnish for those who are in need.

Now why not start a mutual order in the church? The example is certainly pointed out in the first church, for we read, "They appointed special persons to look after those who were in need." With a provision of this kind in working order in the church, would not the members be in as good, if not better place, to spend their long evenings, as they do now with the lodges?

BETTER THAN SPANKING.

Spanking does not cure children of urine difficulties. If it did there would be few children that would do it. There is a constitutional cause for this. Mrs. M. Summers, Box 183, Notre Dame, Ind., will send her home treatment to any mother. She asks no money. Write her to-day if your children trouble you in this way. Don't blame the child. The chances are it can't help it.

News From Many Fields

Northern California.

For the month of February our missionaries have shown remarkable results from their efforts, having baptized 90 people and added 43 otherwise. This is the greatest single month's work, as far as visible results are concerned, perhaps, in our history. Certain it is that this exceeded a whole year's work of only two years ago.

February was a remarkably rainy month also. In some places it rained every day in the month and as much as 24 inches was registered at Healdsburg in as many days.

An amusing thing was a thunder storm which killed a dog and nearly threw many people into fits and hysterics, for, be it known that real lightning and are thunder something that the Californian only experiences about once in five years.

Two months ago people were talking "dry year" and praying for rain. Now they can at least feel their prayers have been answered.

Financially our state mission work is very prosperous also. The first seven months of the year we have passed last year's finances entire.

C. E. Dougherty has accepted the work at Pasa Rables and is on the ground. He is young, energetic, and will, no doubt, do a good work there. This board is assisting in his support.

L. C. Haulman, from Washington, is supplying for Williams and Dunnigan and may be called to remain with that work.

Clara H. Hazelrigg, as evangelist, assisted by Miss Mildred Hazelrigg as musical director, is making a record for good work in California as she has elsewhere.

They closed the Stockton meeting in three weeks with 43 added, and the Napa meeting they had 42 added in 33 days, of which 30 days were rainy. They are now at work at Santa Cruz and we look for like good results there.

A. L. Platt, assisted by J. A. Carroll, singer, starts off well at Selma.

Healdsburg. J. P. DARGITZ, Cor. Sec.

Southwest Missouri.

Everything considered, A. J. Williams, our district evangelist, is holding one of the greatest meetings in this section for some time past. He is at Aurora, with 70 added at last report. No wonder the church there has called him as minister. If he should accept, it will be to the loss of the district work.

The church at Webb City has not yet chosen a successor to Bro. E. M. Barney, who went to Mishawaka, Ind.

Bro. D. A. Campbell, who held a fine meeting at Carterville some weeks since, is there again reorganizing the forces and getting them in shape to call a minister. He is from Iowa. We hope Missouri may prove so attractive as to hold him among us.

Joseph Gaylor, the indefatigable state evangelist, is ever going here and there planting new congregations and strengthening old ones. He will soon be at Carl Junction again to "set things in order." There will be many stars in his crown.

E. W. Bowers goes back to Iowa, and thus the First Church, Springfield, is without a shepherd. Splendid reports come from the work of Brother Kersey, of the Central, same place, while D. A. Moore, of South Street, is on a trip to Europe and Palestine.

S. G. Clay, of Lebanon, and J. T. McGarvey, of Carthage, will tour this section in the interest of the May offering, and no better selections could have been made.

J. P. Davis closed his work in Golden City and is now in Colorado.

The church at Marionville, under the leadership of Brother Yokley, expect to worship in their new house on Easter Sunday. It is built of brick and is modern in arrangement.

J. H. Jones comes from La Belle to Boliver for full time. Here is our welcome.

The Southwest Missouri Preachers' Institute will be held this year at Aurora, May 2-4.

This is the home of the Christian Herald, of which W. B. Cochran is editor, and which is growing in circulation and usefulness. Let the preachers and other interested workers of the district be ready to attend.

F. L. Moore, of Republic, preached yesterday at Galena, Kan., our neighbor just eight miles away. The church there have their eyes on him as minister, and if Republic is not careful they will soon be hunting another man. This reminds me to say that on the first Sunday in April Evangelists Harlow and Ridenour will begin a union meeting in Galena. When it was announced there some months ago that they were coming, the pastors of the M. E., Baptist and Presbyterian churches came to our minister and also to Brother Harlow and requested the privilege of working with him in a union meeting. After some conference together, in which the details were all canvassed, it was so arranged. This is the first instance of the kind of which I have known in our religious history. I shall report later as to the results. It is sure that the full gospel will be preached in that meeting.

Simpson Ely and family, as well as his son, are moving here to make their future home. Brother Ely will continue in evangelistic work. His aged mother, as well as two sisters, live near here and are members of this congregation. We are certainly glad to welcome such well-known workers to Southwest Missouri. The younger brother will practice his profession of osteopathy. No doubt many of our churches in this section will enjoy the labors of Brother Ely in protracted meetings.

The South Joplin Church will be six months old the First Sunday in April. It will celebrate this event by dedicating the house of worship. J. W. Baker is the minister. This church is self-supporting from the start. They have property worth $3,000 and a membership of nearly 400. Already the Sunday-school has outgrown the house and an addition will be built at once for the primary department, Christian Endeavor work, etc. They are talking strongly of erecting a new building next year that will be adequate to their needs. Their offering for foreign missions will be about $30. This is more than the mother church gave five years ago.

At the First Church, Joplin, we have received 57 additions since the meeting. Audiences tax the building. Enlargement or swarming again soon seems imperative. The new members have not all backslidden yet. We have a few out at new converts' meeting Monday night of each week and also on Thursday nights at prayer-meeting services—say enough to fill the main auditorium and sometimes overflow it. We are planning for another campaign with the same evangelists this fall and we want the timid brethren to tell us how many converts they think it wise to receive before we quit. One brother thought we would have a spiritual hospital on hands as the result of our meeting. Well, I would rather be in a hospital than in a refrigerator or a graveyard. Meantime we will continue to baptize all who respond to the sweet invitation of the gospel of the blessed Son of God.

Joplin, Mo.

W. F. TURNER.

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

Our mission at Waynesboro, Pa., is six and a half months old. We took our first offering for foreign missions March 6, over $5. Ninth Street, Washington, got $119.33. They hope to reach $150, their apportionment. They had 359 at Sunday-school March 6.

We have 65 enrolled now in Waynesboro Sunday-school and had one confession at our preaching service Sunday night. This is our first fruits, for which we praise the Lord. The six mentioned in my last letter took membership at Beaver Creek, not here.

Antioch Church, Virginia, have set May 29 for their dedication day. J. T. Watson is preacher there.

We very much regret that Brother Winters continued illness compelled him to give up his work at Fulton Avenue, Baltimore. S. R. Maxwell has resigned at Riverside Park, Baltimore. We need two strong men for these churches.

The new church at Lansdowne, near Baltimore, will probably be dedicated May 22. J. B. DeHoff is the minister there.

J. A. HOPKINS.

Nebraska.

T. A. Lindenmeyer, pastor at Pawnee City, reports nine added there since he took the work. The Ogden meeting at Alma resulted in 12 additions to the church, all from new families.

O. L. Adams has reorganized the Christian Endeavor at Overton. Button revival in the Bible-school and prayer-meeting started.

Fred Barnard has located with the Magnet Church and will move his family there about the first of April.

J. B. White, of North Bend, reports four additions and two deaths there since he began work.

Three baptisms and one added in the Maxwell-McVey meeting at Ulysses. Good audiences are greeting the workers.

The secretary visited Ansley for a few days, remaining over Lord's day, March 13. The church there is united and ready for a good man to locate as pastor as soon as the right one can be had. Money was pledged, partly, to build a new brick walk around the church lot, and a committee appointed to look after it.

C. V. Allison is preaching half time at Palmer. The church at or near Kingston is building a new house. This is a place off the railroad about 12 miles northeast of Ansley.

The old unused church building at Marquette has been sold, after being pretty well battered down by birds and weather and boys. The proceeds after sale will be put in the trust funds.

The secretary will visit the old Bethel Church near Vesta, in Johnson county, on March 16, to assist the few remaining members in properly disposing of the house there. This community has changed so entirely that there are practically none of our people left there.

What about that foreign mission offering? Several churches have reported apportionments doubled and others fully met. How is it with your church? Let Nebraska have her share in the large increase that is coming for this great work of the Lord.

District No. 1 will hold its annual convention at Falls City. The time is not definitely fixed at this writing, but will soon be announced. Some time in April will be the date, however.

The Arbor Day services at Cotner, April 22, should be attended by as many as possible from without the city. It is proposed to have the two men who, more than any other men now living, have advanced the cause of tree culture in the United States, Dr. Miller, of Omaha, and Robt. Furnace, of Brownville. These men will be present and speak on the occasion. The tree planting will be done both on the campus and at the convention grounds. Donation of suitable trees from brethren will be gratefully acknowledged. Let the word be passed along and as many gathered there on that day as possible. The program will appear later.

The church at Geneva will be re-opened on March 20. It has undergone repairs and the payment of the old debt has made it a new house practically. It is hoped that with the repairs will be covered and eradicated every vestige of the troubles that have vexed the church for years.

Is it true that when we are materially prosperous we forget the needs of our souls?

The secretary will soon attend the meeting of the Missouri Valley Secretaries' Association in St. Joseph. Numerous cares will prevent attendance on the congress at Chicago

Let me suggest that the men who go from Nebraska capture that congress for Lincoln next year.

The secretary has been invited to be one of the three necessary parties to a wedding soon. Owing to his nomadic life, this is a luxury not often enjoyed, and he is naturally proud of it. W. A. BALDWIN.
Lincoln, Neb.

Chicago.

The cause in Chicago continues to enjoy an unusual degree of prosperity. The recent dedication at Evanston gives the church there an excellent house of worship. This house was built by the Congregationalists at a cost of $6,000 and was purchased by the Evanston Church for $3,000. The house was redecorated at a cost of $600. L. L. Carpenter was called on to conduct the dedicatory exercises, and the property was dedicated free of debt. The church still retains its old lot near the center of the city, and it is valued at fully $1,750. Thus the work at Evanston is in excellent condition.

The Jackson Boulevard Church is now claiming the largest attendance of any Protestant church on the west side. It also makes this claim for its Bible-school. The recent meetings conducted by John E. Pounds and wife produced a great uplift in all departments of the church work, and the pastor, Lloyd Darsie, is rejoicing over the outlook for the future.

C. A. Young, the stirring editor of the Christian Century, is kept hustling to help anywhere opportunity may present for service.

While Chas. R. Scoville is out holding great meetings, recently at Arcola, Ill., and now at Jacksonville, Brother Young is carrying on the work at the Metropolitan.

The writer has agreed with the City Mission Board and the newly organized church at South Chicago to take up the work at that point. The outlook is hopeful. The meetings are now held in Lodge Hall, which is well located. South Chicago seems destined to outdistance Chicago in some respects, as the lake commerce is rapidly passing from the narrow Chicago River to the Calumet. The largest lake-going vessels can pass into the Calumet, and land along this river, that a decade ago had but little value, has now assumed enormous value. Some of the largest iron and steel industries of the century are there. The Disciples have long overlooked this point, and a little canvass has disclosed a goodly number of willing workers, and the only regret now is that we have so long delayed entering this field.

It is expected that the attendance at the congress next week will be quite large. Every indication points to it. The churches on the south side, Englewood, First, Ashland Avenue, Harvey, South Chicago and Hyde Park will take care of all who come. The headquarters will be in the Hyde Park Church.

ROBT. L. WILSON.

New Orleans Notes.

The church in New Orleans has decided to forever keep their old church and to push their uptown mission with a view to establishing a second church there as soon as practicable. To this end John A. Stevens is here now in a meeting which, it is hoped, may result in the organization of the new church.

The last day of my pleasant ministry here we succeeded in paying off the last dollar of a debt for pavement which had hung like a pall over this church ever since about the time the house was built. The Disciples have resolved to ever keep, never mortgage, and forever stay out of debt at the old church, and if they do so, and then work while it is day, as Christians, success will crown their efforts.

I conditionally promised to accept the East Dallas, Texas, work, believing that that is one of our finest openings for work, and has in the membership of the church some of the choicest spirits I have met. But I have reconsidered and decided to re-enter the evangelistic work in the South, where my services are so much needed, where I was reared, where

Spring Medicine

There is no other season when good medicine is so much needed as in the Spring.

The blood is impure, weak and impoverished—a condition indicated by pimples and other eruptions on the face and body, by deficient vitality, loss of appetite, lack of strength, and want of animation.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Make the blood pure, vigorous and rich, create appetite, give vitality, strength and animation, and cure all eruptions. Have the whole family begin to take them today.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla has been used in our family for some time, and always with good results. Last spring I was all run down and got a bottle of it, and as usual received great benefit." Miss BEULAH BOYCE, Stowe, Vt.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

nearly every one knows me, and where most of my ministry has been spent. I will no doubt move to Birmingham, Ala., as that point will be most central for my work.

It has not been easy for me to resign here in New Orleans where we have not had a particle of friction, where we had during the year, 74 per cent gain in our membership, 44 per cent of which was net gain, where the church gave by voluntary offerings more than three thousand dollars during the year, and where we cannot number our friends outside of our membership. This for the first year in a city, I think, does remarkably well, at least so it seems to those of us who know city work. The last day of our work some of the brethren said we had the largest audience they had seen since the palmy days of Knowles Shaw here, with two additions, one of which was by baptism. But for a time, at least, I must get over the South and help more places than one. I am now making dates for meetings.

O. P. SPIEGEL.

Des Moines.

Our work in Des Moines this winter has been quiet but quite satisfactory. The most notable thing is the change of pastors at the University Church. Dec. 1 Brother McCash laid down the work he had prosecuted so successfully for more than a decade to seek physical recuperation in a less strenuous line. There were doubtless many misgivings as to the future, but, happily, they are all dismissed. That the interval of one month was ably supplied, it is only necessary to state that J. Mad. Williams filled the gap. C. S. Medbury took up the work with the new year in his modest, unassuming, but masterful style, and from his first appearance on the platform has most completely satisfied every member and friend of the church.

A four weeks' meeting has just closed, in which Brother Medbury did the preaching. He calls it just an introduction to the work of the year and to his ministry. It has been a fine introduction of both preacher and people, and, if Brother Medbury's opinion of the people is at all commensurate with their estimate of him, he must be in a happy frame of mind. The meeting added 79 to the membership, 40 by baptism, making 90 since Brother Medbury came, and it is the intention to make it 100 for his first quarter.

E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., spent two weeks with the Central Church. No attempt was made at evangelistic methods, but our people in all parts of the city were greatly benefited by Brother Powell's strong presentation of the gospel, and a few were added. The Central has the pleasant habit of inviting us all to enjoy with it the best the brotherhood affords. Brother and Sister Breeden are just now reveling in the tropical attractions of Old Mexico.

T. J. Dow, of the East Side Church, arranged with Bro. J. K. Shellenberger, of Mankato, Minn., to exchange meetings. Bro. S. gave the East Side people just what they wished, a feast of strong meat for three weeks, and they are not disposed to measure the results in the usual way—by the number of accessions, which was 16. Brother Dow now goes to Mankato, for, about the same length of time.

The meeting at Valley Junction, following the dedication of the new church, did not continue long and added but few. The field evidently was not ready for an ingathering, but our people now have an equipment which makes growth possible, and are laying the foundations for larger things.

Park Avenue has built a fine parsonage and steadily grown in numbers at regular services. It now easily ranks fourth among our city churches in numbers and strength.

Highland Park has remodeled and greatly improved its house of worship and is making very substantial progress in all lines of churchwork.

Grant Park has changed pastors. J. W. Johnson, who served them very acceptably for two years, accepted a call to Redfield, Ia., and J. Tibbs Maxey has taken his place. Brother Maxey now has W. S. Johnson, one of our S. S. evangelists, assisting him in a meeting, which promises well.

Our three missions, Chesterfield, Ninth and Shaw and the South Side, which were nearly wiped out by the great flood, are doing well and are all about back to their normal condition. J. E. Cresmer, a Drake University student, doing his first preaching without compensation, deserves special mention for heroic and successful work at Ninth and Shaw, under most discouraging circumstances.

Drake University is forging ahead, as usual, but our people have become so accustomed to this that any other report would be surprising. The management is now making a strong effort to provide for the erection of several more buildings, which are greatly needed, but we common people don't know just how fast they are succeeding.

Our people do not want to lose sight of Brother McCash, and will be pleased to learn that he feels that he is engaged in the greatest work of his life as superintendent of the Iowa Anti Saloon League. Dec. 1 he opened an office in a small room, with one assistant and a stenographer; they now have four rooms and ten persons employed, besides himself. His very favorable acquaintance and the cause he pleads open every door to him, and he is proclaiming in the colleges and greatest churches of Iowa, of every name, the necessity of union in the face of a common enemy, and is meeting everywhere with strong endorsement and financial support, but insists that he is "sawing wood" and not writing for the papers. He is still with his people and stands by his successor with the utmost good will. S. C. SLAYTON.

Hot Springs, Arkansas.

We haven't been able to secure a tent yet. Brethren, if you have a good tent you are not going to use in May, write me. I want to rent or borrow. We have secured our singer, Bro. I. E. Wharton, a brother to our India Wharton. He will lead the singing. We have received $33 on our tabernacle fund. There are many brethren scattered over the whole brotherhood who have been here and have seen the great value of this point as a mission field, who ought to help the work. I can hardly expect those who were never here and never saw Hot Springs to help, for they cannot realize the importance of this work, and can only think of it in the light they do of hundreds of other places building and needing outside assistance, but I do expect those who have been here and have seen and know the field to assist. Why delay?

JESUS VISITS TYRE AND SIDON.

Mark 8:27-38. (Read also Matthew 16:13-28.)

GOLDEN TEXT:—Without faith it is impossible to please Him. Hebrew 11:6. Memory verses 27-28.

Preview for Quarter.

The lessons for the coming quarter cover the latter half of the ministry of Jesus. The material included in them may be arranged in four divisions as follows:

1. Galilean ministry. Third period, from the retirement into the north until the last departure from Galilee for Jerusalem, including the journey to Tyre and Sidon; Peter's confession; the prediction of death and the resurrection and the transfiguration.

2. Berean ministry, from the last departure from Galilee until the final arrival in Jerusalem, including the mission of the seventy; increasing friction with the Pharisees; many parables and discourses; repeated predictions of death and resurrection, with a keener expectation of the establishment of the kingdom; friendship with Mary and Martha, and the resurrection of Lazarus.

3. Passion week; the triumphal entry into Jerusalem; cleansing the Temple; a day of parables and discourses; the Passover; betrayal, trial, crucifixion and burial.

4. Final victory; resurrection; appearance to disciples and others and the ascension.

The Journey North.

After the feeding of the five thousand, which was followed on the next day by the remarkable discourse upon the bread of life (John 6:22-59) and by Peter's first confession (John 6:68, 69), Jesus withdrew from the multitude which, with all its interest in his words and miracles, had shown itself so completely unable to understand the spiritual character of his teaching. Henceforth to the close of his ministry his chief work is the instruction of his chosen disciples. There is no attempt to secure hearers or to win converts. Precautions are taken to prevent the further spread of his fame and to escape from the thronging multitude. "Tell no man" is the warning which is more than once repeated. It is not that he has less sympathy with the needs of the people, but he sees that as a practical necessity he must save his time and strength for the training of those who were to carry on the work after his death. The retirement of Jesus and his disciples into the north country was in keeping with this plan. But even here it was impossible for him to escape entirely from his wide-spread reputation. A Gentile woman came to him and besought him to heal her daughter, who had an unclean spirit.

A Harsh Saying.

For the first time in the ministry of Jesus, one who sought healing was repulsed, and that with words which seem harsh and unsympathetic. Instead of granting the woman's petition, Jesus told her that it was not fitting to give to the dogs that which properly belonged to the children. Perhaps this saying was an intentional puzzle, or perhaps, in applying to the woman as a Gentile that term of reproach which the Jews of that day commonly used in speaking of the Gentiles, Jesus wished to see whether her faith and her desire for the blessing which she asked were sufficient to cause her to pass over this apparent insult without resentment. Matthew quotes Jesus as saying in this connection: "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." And yet he had healed the centurion's servant and had praised his faith as being greater than any that he has found in Israel.

The Underlying Truth.

Certainly Jesus did not mean to say that he had come to save only the Jews. He who told his disciples to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" cannot be accused of placing too narrow limitations upon his mission. Yet there was a sense in which the ministry of Jesus was limited to the Jews. They alone had the historic preparation, for they alone had been educated in the principles of righteousness and true religion through successive revelations which, though partial, yet gave them an immeasurable advantage over the Gentile world. Jesus said that he came not to destroy the law; neither did he come to ignore it, but to fulfill and utilize it. The Gentile world might be expected to look upon him only as a wonder-worker. He wanted the Jews to see in him their expected Messiah.

The Gentile world was not cut off from hope of salvation through Christ, but his personal ministry, brief as it was, could only be made effective by being kept within somewhat narrow limits. If it was necessary for him to spend nearly half of his three years of public life in the training of twelve men, how much more was it necessary for him to resist the temptation to dissipate his energies in attempting the immediate relief of the whole sin-burdened Gentile world. Even the Master must be patient. He narrowed his ministry that it might become effective. He taught twelve men that they in turn might teach others of their fellow-countrymen, so that these when the time was ripe might become missionaries throughout the world. It is a divine impulse of sympathy and zeal which urges many young men into the ministry without preparation, because they feel that in the face of the world's need they cannot wait. It would be well if they would add to that divine sympathy the divine wisdom exhibited by Jesus, and choose the course which will be the most productive of results in the long run. He who is doing the work of God can afford to be patient.

The Prayer Answered.

But it happened that this particular Syro-Phoenician woman, whose daughter was afflicted, had a degree of faith and humility which was quite exceptional. She was not to be offended by any words that might be used toward her. What she wanted was the healing of her daughter. She believed Jesus could do it and she proposed to continue her petition until he did do it. And now as her request had given Jesus an occasion for the declaration of the principle touching his relation to Judaism, her persistence gave him an opportunity to show the efficiency of patient, persistent and expectant prayer. For her petition was granted her and her daughter was healed.

The Return to Galilee.

After a stay of unknown duration in this northern country, during which Jesus doubtless gave to his disciples much instruction which is not recorded, he returned to Galilee, and we next find him with the Twelve in the region east of the sea of Galilee. Apparently there was no great amount of miracle-working, but on one occasion a man who was deaf and dumb was brought to Jesus for healing. His hearing and speech were restored, and again the warning was given which was quite in keeping with the purpose of Jesus in this part of his ministry: "Tell no man."

BROTHERLY LOVE.—

Heb. 13:1.

"Let love of the brethren continue."—Heb. 13:1.

This theme is always timely. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples," said Jesus, "if ye have love one for another." (John 13:35.) This shows that the kind of love here spoken of was the fruit of Christ's teaching, and was not common among men. Otherwise it would not have been a mark of discipleship. As the peculiar product of Christianity it deserves not only our study, but our assiduous cultivation.

The New Commandment. As indicated above, a new and striking feature of Christ's religion was the peculiar affection which his disciples felt toward each other. This was not an accompaniment, an ornament or mere accomplishment, but a vital part of His religion. On that solemn night of his betrayal he said to his disciples, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." If this commandment is not binding on Christians to-day, then nothing that Jesus taught is binding. And yet brethren sometimes feel at liberty to hate or despise one another who are very punctilious about much less important matters in connection with Christianity.

The measure of brotherly love. "Even as I have loved you." This is a high standard. He loved his disciples even unto death. He laid down his life for us as the pledge and measure of his love. John reasoned correctly when he wrote, "Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another." (1 John 4:11.) Are we prepared to lay down our lives for our brethren, even for those who may differ from us in opinion? If not, to that extent we fall short of the example which Christ has set for us, and of the commandment which He has given to us.

The effect of such love. It has already been stated. It is an open proclamation to the world that we are Christ's disciples. Love is the most winsome and attractive thing in the world. When men shall see Christ's followers manifesting this mutual love and care for each other, bearing each other's burdens and sharing each other's joys, they, too, will take notice that they have been with Jesus, and they will be instinctively drawn to inquire concerning a religion that produces such desirable results. Brotherly love would be the mightiest evangelizing force in the church, if it were practiced as Christ taught and exemplified it.

Brotherly love as the test of our conversion. "If a man say I love God, and hates his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, cannot love God whom he hath not seen." (1 John 4:20.) This phase of the subject demands our serious consideration. "By this shall ye know that ye have passed from death unto life, that ye love the brethren"—not a few favorite brethren, your personal friends, but all who are Christ's.

A condition of Christian union. The absence of brotherly love is no doubt the chief obstacle to Christian union. There are differences of judgment, different tastes, and different creeds and politics, we know, but brotherly love, once it comes up to the standard of the new commandment, will find a way to harmonize these differences, or embrace them all in a wider and more comprehensive unity.

Yes, "let love of the brethren continue." And where it has already been discontinued, let it be renewed. We cannot, either for our own sake or for the sake of the church, afford to remain in alienation with our brethren.

Prayer: Our Father, who art in heaven, we thank Thee for Thy great love to us, even while we were enemies to Thee, in that Thou didst give Thy Son to die for us. Inspire within us, we beseech Thee, the same love for one another that led our Lord to lay down his life for us. And may the moral effect of this mutual love among brethren be the union of Christians and the conversion of the world. For Christ's sake. Amen!

OUR VICTORIES THROUGH CHRIST.—

1 Cor. 15:50-58.

For the Leader.

We have approached another Eastertide. The warm sun of the springtime is beginning to call forth a response from sleeping nature. The death and gloom that reigned a few weeks ago are giving away to life and hope. The birds sing; the brooks babble happily along; the green herb breaks the crust, and it is no longer the hope of life, or a longing for it, or a philosophy that it will come, but the acceptance of the fact that it is here. So does the resurrection of Jesus follow the long winter of hope, of longing, of human philosophy on the subject. If a man die, shall he live again? The problem has been demonstrated. Here in the Gospels is the demonstration written down. It is a fact. Straightway let us hail it with joy and rejoicing. Let us follow and see this evening how in the springtime of this gracious assurance the activities of all the nobler sentiments of the human heart have come to light and have begun to grow.

For the Members.

1. In the smaller things of life our victories have been won through Christ. Not in the little things have we been able to win alone. Our feelings of confidence in our own strength is taken away the moment the realization of the beginning of the struggle dawns upon us. Now, if in the least we are helpless alone, how can we expect to stand in the great struggles? Surely we need him all the time. He helps us to gain all our victories.

2. How many of the serious struggles of life has Christ turned into victories for us? More than we could number, if we should take all the time for the meeting for that alone. Do I remember my doubts when I was away from him, before I took my stand upon his precious promises? Yes. I remember, too, that when I brought them to him in that determination to take him at his word, he took the doubts away and gave me sweet assurances and strong convictions in their stead. In the temptations that beset me from my old associates when I was new in the service of my Master, he helped me to overcome. And in all my trials and temptations and troubles he has been my companion and stay.

3. When death has come into my home, what has kept my heart from breaking? The sweet consolation of my Savior. How have I been able to see my dear ones lowered into the cold grave to mingle with the dust, and return to my pleasant home and enjoy anything about it again, or to my humble cabin, with its bare walls and floor, with heart to again take up the burdens of life? It has not been through the comforts of my friends, though they have been kind. It has not been through sheer force of my own will, though it has been of great service to me in such hours. It has been through the words of my Savior. Though all the stars and suns of heaven have shone upon the dark abodes of death for more than a thousand years several times repeated, none but the Sun of Righteousness has ever penetrated the green sward and lighted up the dark caverns of the land of the dead.

4. Flesh and blood have in it the seeds of decay and sorrow. It cannot enter the dwelling place of the happy without jeopardizing it. Flesh is carnal. It is corruption. It is mortal. This corruption must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immor-

Our Budget

—D. H. Bays is on his way to Syracuse and Albany, N. Y. He will deliver a course of lectures on Mormonism in each of these cities.

—E. J. Lampton of Bowling Green, Mo., has been ill with grip for three Sundays and unable to fill his pulpit. Mrs. Lampton has also been very ill. Both are now improving.

—W. E. Gray has been compelled to move from Thayer to Willow Springs, Mo., because he could not secure a house in the former town. He is the pastor of the churches at both of these points.

—The Disciples of Christ in Missouri are reminded of the Missouri Lectureship which meets in Fulton, April 11-14. The program is good, and the accommodations will be good, and you ought to be there.

—The new Christian church at Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, has been completed at a cost of $15,000. It is a beautiful building and does great credit to the church at that place. J. A. L. Romig is pastor of this enterprising congregation.

—B. B. Sanders, of Austin, Texas, state evangelist of the Lone Star State, called at our office while on business in this city during the past week. He reports the cause as being greatly prospered in Texas and that many new churches are being organized.

—The new Christian Church at Aledo, Tex., was dedicated March 6, J. S. Myers of Fort Worth, officiating. Every dollar needed to pay for the building was raised before dedication day, and the congregation begins the use of the church with no debt on the building.

—The current issue of "Business in Christianity," which, as our readers know, is devoted to the interests of church extension, has a special church building number. It contains a large number of designs for churches suitable for various locations and at prices ranging from $4,000 to $30,000.

—That the ordinance requiring that all saloons in the city of St. Louis be closed and kept closed from midnight on Saturday until midnight Sunday, is absolutely ignored, is a matter of general knowledge. Petitions are now being circulated throughout the city asking for the enforcement of the existing law.

—E. W. Brickert, of Houston, Texas, writes that he will give half his time to the new mission at a strategic point in Houston and will pay for the hall if the brethren at large will contribute $25 per month. The money can be sent directly to him or to B. L. Smith, Cincinnati, stating the purpose for which it is to be used.

—J. H. Hardin, of Boston, will canvass Kentucky during the month of April in the interest of the May offering for home missions. Brother Hardin will remain in the west and evangelize in the general field. His time will doubtless be well occupied. His address until further notice will be care Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati.

—The facilities and accommodations of Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky., will be increased for the coming year according to the recent decision of the Board of Curators of Kentucky University. About $5,000 worth of improvements were made last year, and the success of the school under the new management, with Mrs. St. Clair at its head, will probably necessitate one or two more new buildings in the very near future.

—H. D. Williams, of Middle Grove, Mo., has been chosen by the Trustees of Christian University, Canton, Mo., to fill the vacancy in the chair of Latin caused by the death of Prof. Youngblood. He will take up this work at once. We take it for granted that Bro. Williams' technical qualifications for this work are all that they should be. As to the no less important qualifications of character and ability to exercise a right influence upon the students, all who know him are well assured. He will add strength to the Canton faculty and will wield a strong influence for good over the young men of that institution.

—Sumner T. Martin, Bellaire, O., desires to hear from churches or individuals who have found "tithing" or other "proportionate giving" a blessing. Also titles, authors, prices and publishers of helpful literature (books, tracts, articles, etc.) on the subject. Also, any useful and striking examples and incidents of such giving among the denominations known to any one who reads this.

—A Y. M. C. A. building to cost $50,000 is to be erected in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, the expense to be provided for from the estate of the late George L. Seeley. What is considered the finest and is certainly the largest Y. M. C. A. building in this country will be opened in New York City, March 21. The building cost $860,000, has all the appointments of a first-class club and is designed to accommodate a membership of three thousand men.

—Christian Leisch, of Greenville, Ill., has given $10,000 to our National Benevolent Association on the annuity plan. The gift resulted directly from a visit of the General Secretary of the Association, Geo. L. Snively, who was assisted in the negotiations by Henry M. Meier, a member of the Board of Directors of the Association. Mr. Leisch is a member of the Greenville Christian Church and is engaged in the poultry and egg business. This is the largest cash sum that the Benevolent Association has yet received.

—Reports continue to come in concerning the great meeting recently held by Bro. Scoville at Jacksonville, Ill. The pastor, Russell F. Thrapp, writes that in the history of the church, which extends over seventy-three years, there has never been a meeting so far-reaching as this one. The work was done not only in the church but in the homes, stores and shops of the city. The work of the singer, James S. Helm, was highly satisfactory. At the close of the meeting the converts presented to Bro. Scoville a beautiful opal ring and a check for his church lot in Chicago. The pastor received a suitably inscribed gold medal to be worn as a watch charm.

—A note from W. F. Richardson informs us that the Missouri State Board of Missions has granted Corresponding Secretary T. A. Abbott, a month's leave of absence for complete rest. We are glad to learn of this action. Brother Abbott's health requires it, and his many years of faithful service for the brotherhood of the state entitle him to this brief respite. We are sure our readers will join us in the earnest wish and prayer that his health may be fully restored. Meanwhile the churches owe it to the State Board, which represents them, and to Brother Abbott, as well as to the cause, to discharge their obligation to the state work fully and promptly. It is not right to lay such heaven burdens of responsibility on public servants and not stand by them. Brother Richardson, chairman of the board, carrying his own heavy burden of work, has the added burden of anxiety for the state work on his heart, and the brethren of the state should relieve this strain by meeting their obligations.

—The Christian Citizens' Council is the name of a new organization which has a distinct field. Its object is "to cultivate a missionary spirit, promote business methods in church work, secure systematic contributions for missionary purposes, and arouse deeper interest in Christian work among business and professional men." The organization was originated in Nebraska and is limited to that state, but there is no reason why similar organizations should not be formed in other states. C. S. Paine, of Omaha, who will be best remembered as chairman of the Executive Committee for the Omaha convention in 1902, is president of the organization, and W. W. Slabaugh is first vice-president. The intention is to secure the organization of as many local councils as possible to co-operate in the work of the society. Inquiries and correspondence should be addressed to L. C. Oberlies, Corresponding Secretary, Lincoln, Neb.

—A great book is the next best thing to a great personality, and such a book often sums up the best thinking of its author and vastly augments the influence of his life. The Christian Publishing Company is about to put on the market such a book. It is to be entitled, "Man Preparing for Other Worlds." Its author is a no less distinguished writer, preacher and lecturer than Dr. W. T. Moore. It deals with the whole problem of man's struggles and victories in the world, and his destiny hereafter in "other worlds." It is the cream of Dr. Moore's reading and thinking through a long and useful life, dedicated to the highest interests of mankind. It is scarcely to be doubted that the book will attract wide attention in the religious world, for it deals with questions in which all men are profoundly interested, and it deals with them in a fresh, original, independent way that will command attention, even where it does not win assent. The work is to be elegantly printed on the best of paper, and will retail for $2. Further announcements soon.

Dedication at Literberry.

Geo. L. Snively recently rededicated the Christian Church edifice at Literberry, Ill. Since Bro. H. G. Vandervort became their minister, that congregation outgrew the old home, and was compelled to build a large addition thereto. While building, beautiful new pews, an organ, and furnace were added to the equipment of the church. Literberry now has one of the most beautiful and convenient village church homes in the state.

The pastor is greatly beloved by his people. He began revival services immediately after the dedication that will doubtless be richly blessed. The church was rededicated free of debt.

Illinois Notes.

Mechanicsburg, in Sangamon county, is one of the old churches of the state. William Picknell, one of the charter trustees of Eureka College, lived and died here, loved and honored by all who knew him. He was the father of the late J. H. Picknell, whose devotion to the cause of Christ had much to do with the prosperity of religious enterprises in Harristown, Chicago and Springfield. Among his children are Mrs. C. S. Medbury, Des Moines, Ia., Bro. John Garvey, Dr. Hill, Dr. Riddle,—all among the leaders in the church.

Mrs. Mabel (Riddle) Carlock, with her three children, is at home with her father in Mechanicsburg. Both she and her husband, Judge Carlock, were graduates of Eureka College. He was a talented Christian lawyer and was sent to the Philippine Islands by the United States government as one of the judges in the reconstruction. He died of cholera about a year ago and the government returned his lonely widow and her three children to the old home.

Buffalo, four miles away, has a good church. With such men for leaders as the Ellingtons, Garveys and Fletchers as leaders it could not fail. It has suffered greatly by removals and deaths, yet it pushes forward with a most commendable zeal. It has probably arranged with Bro. H. C. Morrison, of Springfield, to serve them as minister.

Sick with gripp! How suddenly and unexpectedly our work may stop. A month off. Time to review and forecast a trip, apparently, almost to the gates of death. But thanks to our good Father, good doctor, and good wife, health seems to be returning and I hope soon to be in the field again. Illinois will yet do her part and take her proper place and express in no uncertain way its righteous sentiment for Christian education for all, and a still more thorough education of the Christian ministry.

Education Day, so far as reported, was observed by fifty-two churches. If space was not so precious I would like to give you their names and preachers. Twelve members were added to the Illinois Christian Educational Association. Cash received, $306.69; pledges made, $830.50; total, $1,136.19. I regard this a fine showing. Practically this is the second effort made in Illinois to get a general offering for Christian education. But it is now a settled plan by the Disciples in the United States to observe Education Day. This work must be counted in.

There are several remarkable things about the offering: 1. Seven men pledged $100 each. Perhaps at no general call in our state have there ever been as many large pledges; 2. That seven men should do more than all the rest of the state; 3. That 752 churches and 300 preachers should be willing to be silent on a call that lies at the very foundation of our growth and development. Some, however, will observe the day yet; 4. If all the preachers and the churches had done as well as those reporting it would have given Eureka College $15,000, which would have equaled our offering to foreign missions last year, which we so cheerfully and happily gave.

The supply of ministers demands the support of our educational institutions. We have a great state, in it a great brotherhood, a noble class of people needing Christian education. It can do a faithful part towards supplying the world with Christian leaders. Eureka College has shown its ability to prepare men for the conflict, as is attested by its little army of men in the United States and its noble men and women on the foreign fields.

Six churches in our state, whose preachers are graduates of Eureka College, planned and carried to conclusion recently meetings with such help as could be secured, resulting in about 800 additions to the churches. These are Carbondale, Charleston, Arcola, Champaign, Bloomington and Jacksonville. We need such men in fifty cities in Illinois, besides a great army for the beyond. There is probably not a city in the United States of 5,000 people, unless they be foreigners, where if we had a good preacher in it, we could not have a good church in it in five years. We look to the college for men. It deserves our most liberal support. J. G. WAGGONER.

Indian Territory.

Last Lord's day the writer visited Holdenville and Ada. The first named of these two splendid modern cities is in the Creek Nation at the crossing of the Choctaw division of the Rock Island, and the Texas division of the Frisco. It is in the midst of a fine agricultural country. Ada is some thirty miles south of Holdenville. In both of these little cities we have flourishing missions. Bro. C. L. Crane divides his time between the two points, and is held in high esteem by his people.

Monday we returned to the Choctaw Nation, visiting Haleyville, where we arranged for Bro. I. H. Teel to hold a meeting. He began the following night, and it is to be hoped he will meet with much success. The writer expects to spend next Lord's day at Muskogee, and on Monday night begin a meeting at Mounds. We have now been in the field one and a half months, have visited at twenty towns and cities, and have found the work in discouraged condition, but since our work begun, things have brightened up, and now the outlook is considered by those who know most of it to be very promising.

Bro. Randolph Cook is doing a great work at Vinita.

Brother Groom, who has just closed a meeting at Bristow, is in the hearts of the people at Pryor Creek. There were fifty-four added in the Bristow meeting the last we heard from them.

I again desire to ask correspondents to enclose stamps. S. R. HAWKINS, Cor. Sec.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

The convention of Platte district was held at Liberty and was up to the high mark usual with this district. The attendance, while not large, was representative, and a more enthusiastic, devoted gathering of women it would be difficult to find. Miss Mary Hord, the manager, presided, with much dignity, and Miss Annie Darby acted as secretary pro tem. The state president, Mrs. M. M. Goode, gave the opening address, which was much enjoyed by all.

The addresses in general were short and to the point; each one pointed to higher ideals to reach. "Only Five Cents a Month" was ably handled by Mrs. M. W. Swain, of Cameron; "Our Island Missions," by Mrs. W. T. Henson, of Lathrop; "India," by Mrs. Flora Montgomery, of Lawson; "Bible Chairs," by Mrs. R. G. Frank, of Liberty, and "Young People's Work," by Miss Martha Stout, of Kansas City. Mrs. Culver, of Grayson, sent her paper, being unable to attend. The "failures" on the program were conspicuous by their infre-quency, the most notable being Miss Sublette, of St. Joseph, whose place was ably filled by R. W. Wallace, Cameron's young pastor. To the great joy of the secretary and to the satisfaction of the whole convention, Miss Hord was prevailed upon to continue her position as manager. MRS. L. G. BANTZ.

Correspondence

The Gideon Movement.

One evening in 1899, Mr. John H. Nicholson, of Janesville, Wis., entered the Central Hotel of Boscobel, Wis., for the night. The hostelry was crowded to its fullest capacity. The landlord told Mr. N. that the best he could do was to put him in a double room, or in other words, one with two beds, with a companion, yet not a bed fellow. Mr. Nicholson acquiesced, and the landlord took him over to the writing table and introduced to him Mr. S. E. Hill, of Beloit, Wis. It was a kindly meeting. After an exchange of greeting, they retired to their room. Mr. Nicholson took out his Bible, and after reading aloud and prayer, they slept.

Weeks passed by, and though they seldom met, a tie of friendship existed between the two traveling men. On May 31, 1899, they again met by mere chance, as indeed most travelers generally do, on the street at Beaver Dam, Wis. A discussion of the possibilities of an organization of Christian traveling men followed. It was decided to call a meeting of such men for this purpose. So letters were immediately sent to their Christian associates, naming 2 P. M. July 1, 1899, place of meeting Y. M. C. A., Janesville, Wis. At the appointed hour, but three of the men notified put in their appearance. Not discouraged at the small attendance, they proceeded to hold the meeting. Prayer was offered, and the organization now called Gideons, which honors the kingdom of Christ among traveling men, became a reality. Mr. S. E. Hill was chosen president, Mr. W. J. Knights, vice-president, and Mr. J. H. Nicholson, secretary and treasurer. The question of name was debated. After thoughtful prayer, Brother Knights with uplifted eyes and open heart said, "Gideons," and in an instant it was adopted as a God-given name. The seventh chapter of Judges was then read. The organization was completed at a meeting of seven members out of thirty-eight, at Waukesha, Wis., Sept. 1, 1899. At this meeting the emblem by which we recognize each other on the road, was thought out. You know the emblems of the weapons that Gideon's 300 used in their first battle were the pitcher and the torch. The colors of our emblem are red torch, white pitcher and blue background. This, you will note, makes it national.

The pitcher indicates that the wearer should be full of the Holy Spirit, the torch, the overflowing of the Holy Spirit, that will cause every Gideon to reach out after souls. Every true Gideon who wears the button has an impulse to be more aggressive for Christ than before putting the button on.

With the second year of the organization, it was decided to publish a magazine, to be known as the Gideon. Every member receives the magazine. Its articles compare well with those of our best religious journals; in fact, many of them are the fruits of the highest religious intellects. It has grown to a 50 page publication, issued at Madison, Wis., semi-monthly. The most important department of the Gideon is the auxiliary. Without formal meeting, the wives and daughters are united in a close relationship. They were quick to grasp the value of the work in their husbands and fathers, as well as the influence it would have over unchristian traveling men. The value of this department cannot be overestimated.

The requirements for membership in the Gideons are simple, yet rigidly adhered to. An application blank contains, among other things, these questions: What church are you a member of? Pastor's name? Place? If this application is accepted, I promise to wear a Gideon button. Annual dues, $1. When accepted, the applicant receives a membership card, a Gideon button and the Gideon magazine free.

The object is to recognize Christian traveling men of the world with cordial fellowship, to encourage each other in the Master's work, to improve every opportunity for the betterment of the lives of our fellow travelers, business men and others with whom we come in contact. State camps exist in many states, and various local camps are distributed throughout the United States. Church membership is an absolute requirement. It is not an ism, and its members are not Gideonites, any more than the members of this church are Campbellites. Our members are Gideons. Gideon took his orders from God, and commanded the Gideonites. Modern Gideons obey God, and command no one.

The methods of work are, personal contact, man with man, in hotels, on trains, in offices, anywhere. Remarkable stories of results of such methods could be told.

The pastors of Chicago had their attention called to the possible usefulness of the Gideons in the church, and one after another invited them to take charge of some evening service, as we have been invited here to-night. Results were so satisfactory, the interest, zeal, spirituality so real, that the demand for the Gideons' services became so great, that it is now necessary to hold meetings every Sunday evening in three different and distinct parts of Chicago. One is held in the parlors of the Great Northern Hotel. Pastors are encouraged, and many souls are being saved for Christ.

"Upper room" camp fires are frequent, being not unlike our prayer-meetings—like them in purpose, but unlike in results. One must attend to know the difference. Socials in private homes they have, but so unlike most socials of Christian people. No clap-trap to draw the people, no prize, premium, no ping pong or "silly games, no trap to draw the un-Christian into the net so they can see how near the world Christians can live and yet remain Christians," but overflowing hearts of joy in Jesus, open, frank testimony, prayer (do we ever hear prayer at our church socials?) in which wives and daughters join. Conventions, state and national, are held yearly. This is the Christian traveling man's Endeavor. Wherever possible, they go to these conventions, and the help and inspiration they receive and take away with them cannot be measured in the weight or measures of worldly standards. It can only be counted in happy thoughts of leading others in the way of truth and right, justice, honesty in the daily life.

"Do We Need It?"

It is not often that my articles appear in the papers—thanks are due the editors—but I have had thrust upon me a question that demands immediate consideration. It is not an original question with me. Doubtless it would have been, if necessity was always the mother of invention.

A few days ago I went to the city to sell my cattle. I am what Brother Lucas calls a farmer preacher. In the station I met one of our most highly educated and popular preachers. He was in haste, and so was I. Therefore we at once entered upon a discussion of the inefficiencies of our "Institutions of Learning." Our discussion was both spirited and thorough. As he stepped upon his train, he said:

"Brother Filander, what do you think of the idea of establishing a college just to teach our preachers common sense?"

It was time for his train to go, and he wanted my opinion before he left, so I had to think rapidly and to the point. My business is such as to keep me on the lookout for "chinch bugs and cut-worms," so I said:

"I see two things in the way, namely, lack of students and competent professors."

Evidently my objections were original. He had never thought of encountering such hindrances. I could tell it by the way he looked. However, he gave his head a quick jerk, stuck his finger out in a characteristic way and shouted:

"Do we need it? Filander, do we need it? That is the question."

The train was going, and I had no time to reply. Nevertheless, he set me to thinking.

OIL FOR THE BODY

You can't lose an atom without feeling it. The body is like an engine, a watch, a machine; must be kept in good order to run right.

That's the reason Scott's Emulsion is so successful in all wasting diseases. It feeds, nourishes and strengthens when ordinary food won't.

Doctors say Scott's Emulsion is the best nourishment for those who are not as well as they should be—young or old.

We'll send you a sample free upon request.
SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl Street, New York.

Were my objections well taken and my fears well founded?

The next day a good sister told me that her pastor had, some months before, gone into a "get-rich quick" concern, and that he is now looking for a pastorate where the salary will be sufficiently large for him to straighten out his "profit and loss" account.

I am told that Evangelist Boom-the-meeting, while holding a revival at Greatfalls, spent most of his time writing letters to brother preachers and business men, whom he knew, telling them of the splendid opportunity to make big money on a "clean proposition." At the same time the brethren were paying Evangelist Boom-the-meeting $75 per week for his services. It was one of these letters that led the aforesaid pastor to the "shearing pens," half of his fleece—not less than some hundreds—going to Brother Boom-the-meeting for his services in the confidence business.

The pastor at Racketsburg is a college graduate that took on some educational trimming in the East, yet he had scarcely settled his family in the parsonage before he had gotten into a "delightful squabble" with the official board in his efforts to "infuse new blood." This church has a pastor that it would be glad to send to a college that would just teach preachers common sense. I am not so sure but what a goodly number of students can be found, and that churches will pay the tuition.

My own son—he is at present pastor at Millwood—said to the congregation a few Lord's days ago: "There will be no prayer-meeting this week, as the pastor will be absent for some days." Such nonsense on the part of my own boy is most humiliating.

I at once wrote and told him of a devout little girl that lived in St. Louis and whose parents were going to move to Chicago. The night before their departure she closed her evening prayer by saying: "Now, good-bye, Lord, we are going to move to Chicago tomorrow." But I fear that my boy, even, will not see the point to the story.

I now believe we need that college. I promise one student out of my family. I am not sure but what I ought to take a summer course myself, just to get the thing started. I am in favor of establishing the college and trusting to the Lord for the professors.

"Do we need it?" I can hear him yet. "Do we need it? That is the question."

Franklin's Circle's "Grand Old Man."

Beautiful old age is life's joy and crown. The dignity which honored years bring us is kingly. It was Cicero who said, "I know not any season of life that is passed more agreeably than that of virtuous old age." And the poet Waller sings:

"The soul's dark cottage battered and decay'd Lets in new light through the Chinks that time has made."

Franklin Circle's "grand old gentleman" is Abraham Teachout. Should you visit that church on any seasonable Sunday morning, abiding sense of humor. He appreciates a clever joke and enjoys a hearty laugh.

In his early years, on more than one occasion he preached from the pulpit; sometimes now he speaks or prays in public, and always to the edification of his hearers. He is generously liberal. He has been abundantly blessed in his business interests, and gives largely to many enterprises. Many of our educational institutions have been aided by him. He has been one of the most liberal friends Hiram College ever had; his gifts to that institution alone amounting to many thousands of dollars. He is a regular contributor to the different missionary funds of his church. From the first he has been a staunch you will be sure to see him seated well up toward the front. Brother Teachout is a man who would attract attention anywhere. He will be eighty-seven years old next August, but his eye is undimmed and his natural force unabated. Over six feet in height and weighing more than two hundred pounds, with large finely-shaped head and classic face, his is a commanding figure. The ruddy color in his cheeks, together with his powerful physique, speak eloquently of temperate habits and regular hours. Seldom does he miss a day from his office, and his judgment is still ripe and discerning. How shall a man spend his declining years? Talleyrand once said to a person who could not play whist: "Pray, have you reflected on the miserable old age that awaits you?" Brother Teachout's leisure hours find better employment than that. He reads good literature. He is particularly fond of The Literary Digest and his church papers. He keeps in touch with the doings of the day and is well informed as to the progress and work of the Disciples of Christ. For more than half a century he has been a devout and loyal disciple. He has seen the brotherhood grow from a despised and persecuted little band to a great and honored religious people, and more: in their growth and development he has had a part. He not only knew but was intimate with many of the pioneer preachers. General Garfield was his close friend, and his reminiscences of that versatile Christian statesman are delightfully interesting. Brother Teachout possesses an supporter of the Ministerial Relief Board. An ardent prohibitionist, he has given both time and money to the advocacy of his party's principles.

Brother Teachout is a gentleman of the old school, courtly and dignified in his bearing. No one can long be in his presence without feeling the power of his personality. As for us of the Franklin Circle Church, we all love and revere him. As we look at him and listen to him talk, we think how applicable to him are the lines:

"Rich in experience that angels might covet, Rich in a faith that has grown with the years."

WHAT SULPHUR DOES

For the Human Body in Health and Disease.

The mention of sulphur will recall to many of us the early days when our mothers and grandmothers gave us our daily dose of sulphur and molasses every spring and fall.

It was the universal spring and fall "blood purifier," tonic and cure-all, and mind you, this old-fashioned remedy was not without merit.

The idea was good, but the remedy was crude and unpalatable, and a large quantity had to be taken to get any effect.

Nowadays we get all the beneficial effects of sulphur in a palatable, concentrated form, so that a single grain is far more effective than a tablespoonful of the crude sulphur.

In recent years, research and experiment have proven that the best sulphur for medicinal use is that obtained from Calcium (Calcium Sulphide) and sold in drug stores under the name of Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They are small chocolate coated pellets and contain the active medicinal principle of sulphur in a highly concentrated, effective form.

Few people are aware of the value of this form of sulphur in restoring and maintaining bodily vigor and health: sulphur acts directly on the liver, the excretory organs and purifies and enriches the blood by the prompt elimination of waste material.

Our grandmothers knew this when they dosed us with sulphur and molasses every spring and fall, but the crudity and impurity of ordinary flowers of sulphur were often worse than the disease, and cannot compare with the modern concentrated preparations of sulphur, of which Stuart's Calcium Wafers is undoubtedly the best and most widely used.

They are the natural antidote for liver and kidney troubles, and cure constipation and purify the blood in a way that often surprises patient and physician alike.

Dr. R. M. Wilkins while experimenting with sulphur remedies soon found that the sulphur from Calcium was superior to any other form. He says: "For liver, kidney and blood troubles, especially when resulting from constipation or malaria, I have been surprised at the results obtained from Stuart's Calcium Wafers. In patients suffering from boils and pimples and even deep seated carbuncles, I have repeatedly seen them dry up and disappear in four or five days, leaving the skin clear and smooth. Although Stuart's Calcium Wafers is a proprietary article, and sold by druggists, and for that reason tabooed by many physicians, yet I know of nothing so safe and reliable for constipation, liver and kidney troubles, and especially in all forms of skin disease, as this remedy."

At any rate, people who are tired of pills, cathartics and so-called blood "purifiers," will find in Stuart's Calcium Wafers a far safer, more palatable and effective preparation.

Washington State.

Wister Williams is ministering to the University Place Church (Seattle). The church is well pleased with him.

Neal Cheetham has again taken up the work at Oakesdale.

J. T. Eshelman held a meeting at Hatton and one at Ellensburg with good interest. The number added has not been reported to the writer. Brother Eshelman is the Democratic candidate for treasurer of the city of Tacoma with a good fighting chance of election.

D. Y. Donaldson has lately located with the church at Colfax, Wash., and it is confidently expected that he will do a splendid work.

Washington churches are taking the March offering for foreign missions. Stormy weather in Western Washington on the first Sunday kept many from having fellowship in the work that day, but by faithful work that will be overcome.

One of the recent forward steps in the First Church, Tacoma, is the organization of a Junior Christian Endeavor. This we have greatly desired for some time. More than 20 charter members give the work a good beginning.

Jottings.

The church at Virginia, Ill., uses the individual communion cups. These are the first I have seen. It seemed a little strange to me the first time I sat at the table; but the novelty soon wore off. I do not see anything objectionable in their use.

The fear of microbes and germs led the church to use the individual cups. I think the fear is a baseless one. Our Saviour and his disciples all dipped into the same dish when they ate their meals, and there was no fear of microbes then. We are becoming exceedingly fastidious now-a-days.

If the Virginia congregation were as scrupulous about avoiding contamination with the world and the germs of wickedness as they are literal microbes it would be most commendable. Then there would be no card parties, whist clubs and dancing church members.

People can sometimes strain at gnats and swallow elephants. They care for the body and neglect the soul. They pay tithes in minor matters, but neglect the weightier ones.

A fund is accumulating in the Virginia Church for a pipe organ.

Foreign mission day in this church was a joyful one, and about four times the apportionment was raised.

We have largely lost the good moral effects of baptism in this meeting. They have a notion that they want the baptisms to be private, and without any announcement, and with only a few immediate friends of the candidates present, the holy ceremony is performed. We have had but one public baptism. All the others were privately done.

This is abominable. I do not wonder that pedo-baptists, when compelled to immerse, do so secretly; but it is an anomalous condition among our brethren.

Baptism is a monument to the burial and resurrection of our Lord. Monuments should be seen, and we should have as many people present as possible.

Baptism is a great object lesson. It preaches Christ to the world in a most forceful and impressive way. What though some may come to scoff? They may stay to pray. There was a "generation of vipers" present at the ministry of John the Baptist, but he did not hesitate to baptize the people before their eyes. Multitudes witnessed the baptism of Jesus, and who can measure its moral effect?

It is but fair to say that our Virginia preacher protests against private baptisms, and he deeply regrets that the candidates should demand privacy.

If my readers want to secure one of the best songs recently published, send 25 cents to J. W. Carpenter, Virginia, Ill. It is in sheet form and to be sung by a quartette.

Foreign Mission Notes.

The Foreign Society is already able to report fourteen new Living Link churches this year, and it confidently expects to be able to report six more by the October convention.

Last week the Foreign Society received two annuity gifts, one from a sister in southern Indiana, and one from a brother in Ohio. The society has received nearly $200,000 on this plan.

The Central Church, Youngstown, Ohio, will support C. S. Weaver, Osaka, Japan, as their missionary after this. W. S. Goode is the pastor. C. S. Weaver is one of the most useful missionaries in the Sunrise Kingdom. He is the treasurer of our Japan mission.

The Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y., will support Frank Garrett at Nankin, China, in the future. Brother Garrett is one of the strongest evangelists in China.

The offering of the Mayfield, Ky., church will go beyond $400 for foreign missions this year. Roger L. Clark is the minister.

Massillon, O.—Our combined offerings foot up to $590.32. There are others yet to hear from, which no doubt will bring the amount up to the required $600. The Living Link is assured.—GEO. DARSIE, JR.

Cleveland, O.—One thousand dollars for foreign missions from Franklin Circle is assured.—E. D. JONES.

Mound City, Mo.—We took the offering last Lord's day. Hope to reach our apportionment.—G. L. PETERS.

Liberty, Mo.—The church here was asked for $100. Our offering amounts now to $115.05, and there will be more. This is the largest missionary offering this church ever made.—R. G. FRANK.

Cameron, Mo.—I am glad to say we will pass our apportionment, which was $125.—R. W. WALLACE.

Dexter, Mo.—Apportionment $10; raised first foreign offering about $30.—ALBERT BUXTON.

Joplin, Mo.—Glad to report a good offering in the First Church here, and also in the South Joplin Church.—W. F. TURNER.

Jasper, Mo.—We went ahead of our apportionment yesterday. Two years ago, $2, one year ago, $5, this year a little more than $15.—O. W. JONES.

Boonville, Mo.—The collection for foreign missions amounted to $12.80.—E. H. ROBERTS.

St. Louis, Mo.—Raised $150 for foreign missions at Fourth Church. More to follow.—E. T. MCFARLAND.

St. Louis, Mo.—Offering from the First Church a little in excess of $200.—JOHN L. BRANDT.

Bellaire, O.—About $300 in sight last Lord's day. We are making a personal canvas for the other $100, and it will come.

Harrison, O., March 17.

CALIFORNIA.—Napa, March 10.—The meeting held by Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg and Miss Hazlerigg resulted in 42 additions. The Endeavor was strengthened by 25 new members, the Junior reorganized. All other departments greatly helped. The weather was unusually bad, rain, floods and mud in excess of years. Of the 42 additions, 24 were confessions, 18 by letter and statement. All bills paid and money in the treasury. The gospel was preached and sung so that it won the hearts of saints, sinners and members of the denominations.—S. A. NESBIT.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Washington, March 14.—We have had 10 additions, nearly all baptisms, since last report. Added new chairs. Have new hall in sight; 100,000 bricks donated; also other articles. Will go over our apportionment for foreign missions. Outlook fine in all the churches.—W. L. HARRIS.

Washington, March 16.—One confession at H Street Sunday evening. Everything moving along harmoniously and hopefully. At the regular semi-monthly meeting of Washington ministers Monday, there were 11 additions reported. Bro. W. J. Wright, our general evangelist for the East, was present and reported a meeting recently held by him at Danbury, Conn., resulting in 41 confessions beside others by statement. The following sums were reported from the Washington churches for foreign missions: Vermont Avenue, $240; Ninth Street, $125; H Street, $50; Whitney Avenue, $27; Thirty-fourth Street, $11.10, making a total of $453.10. The churches at the capital are growing in members and missionary zeal.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR, Sec. Washington Min. Association.

FLORIDA.—Jacksonville, March 14.—We are having the greatest meeting in the history of the town. There have been 23 additions in the first eight days. The congregations have been astonishingly large. Last night every available space was taken. Chairs were placed in the aisles and around the pulpit, the doors crowded, and the auditorium 100 feet long, still people could not get in. The meeting is great, and Brother James Small is all right.—RUFUS A. RUSSELL.

Jacksonville, March 16.—Twenty-eight added to date in a meeting here held by Jas. Small for J. T. BOONE.

IDAHO.—Lewiston.—Our meeting with Bro. A. Sanders at Pomeroy, Wash., closed March 6 with 28 additions, 23 by baptism. We are spending a few days with Brother and Sister Pine in Lewiston. The work here under Brother Pine's ministry is moving on nicely. Our next meeting will be at Waterville, Wash. Will begin there March 20. The church there has been without a pastor for some time. We hope to locate some one there.—T. F. STEPHENS AND WIFE, evangelists.

Caldwell, March 14.—Our meeting conducted by J. B. Holmes, of Eugene, Ore., ceased Mar. 11; 63 added to the church here. Brother Holmes is an excellent worker and a good man. He makes the most powerful plea I ever heard. He did us much good. Two more confessions yesterday. Could use some sample copies of your paper.—JOEL M. FISHER, pastor.

ILLINOIS.—Alvin, March 14.—One confession and baptism yesterday at regular services and in the evening we started our Christian Endeavor. We have had a prosperous Junior Christian Endeavor here for some time, but no regular Christian Endeavor till last evening.—C. E. GAUMER.

Bellflower, March 13.—Good congregations. Two members received from the Baptists.—J. D. WILLIAMS.

Eureka, March 16.—The ministerial students of Eureka College have preached 500 sermons, baptized 128 and received 55 into the churches in other ways in the past four months.

They are pastoring about 30 churches. Eureka Church has had 13 baptisms since last report.—A. W. TAYLOR.

Harvey, March 14.—Yesterday was a great day for the church at Harvey. Last night our house was filled to its utmost capacity. Two came forward to take their stand for Christ. We have arranged to preach a series of evangelistic sermons on Thursday evening for at least two months. We look for a great ingathering in the very near future.—JOHN J. HIGGS.

Harvey, March 17.—Three more added last night at our prayer meeting. Between 75 and 100 present. Prospects were never more hopeful. Our one evangelistic service is proving a success. Let other preachers try it.—JOHN J. HIGGS.

Mt. Sterling, March 16.—Meeting closed Sunday night; 21 additions, 11 baptisms. Brother Northcutt went from here to Sedalia, Mo.—WM. M. GREENWELL.

Charleston, March 12.—Our meeting has reached the end of the fifth week with a total of 204 additions to date. Will continue over Sunday and perhaps longer. Bro. Allen Willson is untiring.—W. L. HARDING.

Martinton, March 14.—One more confession at Donovan since the close of our meeting. Others will come soon. Had to postpone the meeting here on account of sickness and bad weather.—T. F. RICHARDSON, pastor.

Pleasant Hill, March 14.—Five additions here Feb. 21, four confessions, one from the M. E. Also five March 6: three by relation, two from denominations. One by letter at White Hall Feb. 28. One baptism at Nebo March 13. Over $20 for foreign missions at Nebo last Lord's day.—O. C. BOLMAN, minister.

Mt. Sterling, March 14.—Bro. H. A. Northcutt closed a short meeting with us last night; 21 additions, mostly by confession. He is a sweet spirited, able preacher of the gospel and has done us great good. One of our converts was Miss Lorena M. Briggs, of Chopin, Ill., who led our music. She is a good leader and a fine soloist. She wants to be a singing evangelist.—N. E. CORY.

De Kalb, March 17.—We organized a Christian church on last Sunday, with 26 members. Of these 15 were by letter and statement, three reclaimed, two by primary obedience, two from the Baptists, two from the M. E.'s, two from the United Brethren. All are adults and 23 are heads of families. Good Sunday-school and Ladies' Aid Society was organized. Twenty dollars per month was pledged toward incidental expenses. The state board will look after this work, as it is the seat of the Northern Illinois State Normal School. This is the second church we have organized in Northern Illinois this year. We go to Rock Falls next. Meade E. Dutt had charge of the singing and was a great yoke-fellow.—HAROLD E. MONSER.

Charleston, March 18.—Over 225 came forward in Allen Wilson meeting with Charleston congregation. Brother Wilson has rare presence of mind and self-command in his work. He excels in clearness and sending the truth home to the heart. He is now at Greencastle, Ind. This is the greatest meeting in Charleston's history in point of attendance and accessions. In thirty-three nights' services, only two nights fell below 500 in attendance, while a number of nights saw from 600 to 800 in attendance. The theater had only 38, I am told, one night. They gladly heard the Word. Our personal workers worked as never before. Forty or more were pledged before the meeting.—WILL F. SHAW.

Coldbrook, March 19.—Closed a two and a half weeks' meeting at Alexis, March 10. The work there had been at a low ebb for some time. Had eight additions, all by baptism, and the brethren are all united again. They are out of debt on their new building, and expect to employ a minister soon. I will preach for them on Thursday nights until they can secure a minister. We need a county organization to look after these weaker points.—LESLIE GARFIELD PARKER.

Browns, March 17.—I visited the church at Richland City, Spencer county, Ind., where I preached seven years, and preached for them on Wednesday night, March 9. I had a full house. I found them in good working order.—J. T. JACOBS.

INDIANA.—Noblesville, March 14.—March offering $200. Two confessions, three added by letter at yesterday's services.—E. B. BARNES.

Ladoga.—We closed seventeen days' meeting at the West Side Church, Kansas City, Mo., March 3, with 42 additions. Brother Aber, the pastor, is an earnest, faithful, godly man, and Mrs. Aber a minister's ideal wife. With these two noble Christians in charge we predict a bright future for the West Side Church. Begin meeting at Clayton, Ind., March 12.—U. H. ALFORD.

Greensburg, March 14.—I turned aside from secular work long enough to hold a short meeting at Royal Center, Ind., which closed Sunday night, the 13th, with 16 additions to the church; eight baptisms, and others were heads of families from the sectarian churches who came into the freedom of the truth. Seems "sort o'" natural to be in a revival meeting, and think I will try it again.—H. B. SHERMAN.

Brook, March 15.—Please report 50 added here to date; we continue.—J. BENNETT, evangelist.

LaPorte.—We have been so occupied with our foreign missionary offering that everything else has been tabled for a time. Our offering was $52.35, more than twice that of last year.—GEO. E. HICKS.

Terre Haute, March 18.—One confession and baptism at our last Wednesday evening prayer-meeting. We are now studying the life of Christ. Sixty-five dollars for foreign missions. We continue the effort next Lord's day. If we fall below our mark, we shall put personal workers in the various sections of the congregation to raise the amount. Leonard Barbre, pastor of the Second Church, has recovered from the measles and is back at his work. He is doing a good work. The district convention will be held with that church this spring.—A. L. WARD, pastor Central Church.

Indianapolis.—During my last visit with the Whitewater church, eight were added; six confessions, two from the New Lights. The apportionment for foreign missions doubled.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

One single bestowal of a million dollars upon the cause of Home Missions alone would multiply results fifty times within a year, and set in operation forces that would multiply in limitless progression throughout the years.

The disciples number 1,220,841 members (conservatively estimated). We ought to average one dollar per member for permeating our own land with the gospel. Last year we averaged 8 cents.

There are records from 10,985 churches. Last year we received offerings from but 2,060 churches.

give a report of the Bristow meetings. We began three weeks ago and have had 57 additions to date—27 by primary obedience, 19 by letter or statement, 10 from the denominations and one reclaimed. Large audiences assembled every night, and several times many were turned away. Yesterday we organized a union C. E. society with 26 active members. The meeting was announced to close last night, but nine more came forward, so we continue until Tuesday anyway. I resume my work at Pryor Creek next Lord's day.—F. HOOKER GROOM.

Muskogee, March 16.—I wish to report one confession and two added to our membership here last Lord's day; this makes two confessions and baptisms and about ten added during the six weeks I have been here. This town of some 10,000 or 12,000 is said to be the best in the Indian Territory. The oil diggers have brought in one "gusher," and now five wells are being drilled; so the future of the town seems assured. Half a dozen fine stone and brick business houses are in process of erection, and others under contract, besides school-buildings, churches and residences. This is a fine field for church work, and we are moving off nicely. We have a generous and energetic church, and new members constantly coming in, and all who come will find a home and a hearty welcome here. Members coming will please not forget to bring their church letters with them and become identified with us as soon as practical on arrival.—JOHN H. CRUTCHER.

Chickasha, March 14.—Four added yesterday—two by confession and two by relation, making 107 since Brother Boen's pastorate began. Have outgrown our house accommodations. Begin a $15,000 structure immediately.—J. SPRINGER.

IOWA.—Glenwood, March 15.—We recently closed a three and one-half weeks' meeting, which resulted in 21 additions to the church, 12 by confession, one each from Baptists, United Brethren and Presbyterians, and the rest by letter and statement. Since the meeting five others have been added, three confessions, one reclaimed and one letter. Home forces did the work with the exception of seven sermons by W. B. Clemmer, of Council Bluffs. His work was greatly appreciated. Foreign mission offering $25, which is double last year's offering.—WALTER L. MARTIN.

Zealand, March 16.—Closed a three weeks' meeting here Monday evening with 50 added, 38 confessions, 24 heads of families, 18 from denominations, 26 came forward the last two days of the meeting. J. P. Garmon sang for us, and the writer did the preaching. Am on my third year as pastor with this good people.—CHAS. D. HOUGHAM.

Corning, March 14.—Meeting less than one week old with three confessions. Audiences growing. Prof. C. E. McVay is the leader of song, and he is doing his work to the satisfaction of all. I can unhesitatingly recommend him. He can be had for an April meeting.—SAMUEL GREGG, evangelist.

Des Moines, March 14.—Meeting closed with yesterday's services; 79 added in all, 40 by primary obedience. Miss Powell and Miss McRae assisted most helpfully in the music. Our new work opens with brightest promises. In church and university our people here are intent upon a great work. The tone is right, the atmosphere wholesome.—CHAS. S. MEDBURY.

Pleasantville, March 19.—I just closed a meeting of two weeks at Fairview close to Pleasantville, with 13 additions, seven baptisms, five from Methodists and one from Evangelical Church. We also had three by statement at this place last Sunday. Will commence frescoing our church at this place soon.—J. W. BABCOCK.

Keokuk, March 19.—One by letter last Sunday night, and one by baptism Wednesday night. Shall raise our apportionment for foreign missions.—J. W. KILBORN.

KANSAS.—Oak Valley, March 10.—Closed meeting at Burlington with their pastor last Lord's day. Thirty-one confessions, eight otherwise, 39 in all. Brother Wright is a good man. I go to Conway Springs next Lord's day to sing for Bro. J. T. Bayr in a meeting there.—A. W. SHAFFER, singer.

Mound City, March 17.—Meeting two weeks old; 11 added. We continue.—C. C. ATWOOD AND WIFE.

Douglass.—I began work here the first of the year at full time, the church for the past few years having only had half time preaching, and so find much to do to arouse interest in those that have become indifferent. We have a loyal, consecrated official board, J. M. Satterthwaite, editor of the Douglass Tribune, is one of the elders and also one of the best Bible-school superintendents we ever knew. We have organized a ministers' union since coming here. The better half has by request filled the pulpit at the Congregational Church, and she also delivered a memorial address on Frances E. Willard at a union service of all the churches in the city, and has been requested to fill the pulpit at the M. E. Church in the absence of the pastor at annual conference.—CHAS. E. F. SMITH AND WIFE, pastors.

Washington.—One more confession.—EDWARD CLUTTER.

Atchison, March 17.—Just closed a three weeks' meeting at Oaktown, Ind., which resulted in 48 additions. Evangelist Eugene T. Martin did splendid work with the old gospel. We led the music and found it a great pleasure to work with those people. Our chorus choir of 100 voices did fine work. Have just begun here, assisting Ed. L. Ely, pastor.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON AND WIFE, song evangelists.

Iola, March 18.—We are now in the second week of our meeting here; 25 up to date. A $9,000 church was dedicated at the beginning of the meeting by W. S. Lowe. Brother Phillips, the pastor, is a wise master builder. He is a host in himself. The church never was so prosperous.—R. A. OMER & SPRAGUE.

LaCrosse, March 18.—Forty-three additions; membership doubled; many are thinking; much Bible reading; meeting continues.—M. M. GATES, the cowboy evangelist, and Geo. E. LYON.

Herington, March 10.—One by primary obedience last Sunday.—F. M. MCHALL.

KENTUCKY.—Williamsburg, March 12.—There were six more additions in our meeting here last night, and this meeting is assuming interesting proportions, being the first one in this old church for many years. They are painting their building, and we will have Bro. J. W. McGarvey here the first Sunday in April, to officiate in ordaining additional officers in the church. The district C. W. B. M. meets here next August.—T. M. MYERS.

Williamsburg, March 14.—There have been seven more additions to the church in this meeting, and the interest has grown to be something unusual for this place. Bro. J. T. Brown, of the Christian Companion, will arrive here to-morrow to aid us in the meeting. Prof. J. W. McGarvey, of the Bible College of Kentucky University, will preach for us here at Barbourville, Ky., next Sunday, the 20th inst.—T. M. MYERS.

MICHIGAN.—Saginaw, March 14.—Great day yesterday. Five confessions and one by letter. Also one confession a week ago. Went beyond apportionment for foreign missions.—J. S. RAUM.

Belding, March 15.—I closed a 27 days' meeting at Battle Creek, with 84 added, 58 confessions. Brother Buzzell, the pastor, and his people are winning, and some day we may expect a strong church at Battle Creek. I also tried to hold a meeting for our mission church at St. Johns in January, but the cold weather forced me to quit with only four added. F. L. Taylor acceptably led our singing.—W. H. KINDRED.

MISSOURI.—Marceline, March 15.—There was one more addition to the church here last Sunday evening. This makes 25 additions in the regular services since the first of January.—A. MUNYON.

Louisiana, March 14.—Thirty-two additions to date. Meeting continues. Brother Coombs will go next to Canton, Mo.—M. S. JOHNSON.

Kansas City, March 14.—Meeting a week old. Five confessions and one returned prodigal. We will continue indefinitely. While this congregation is small, it has an excellent corps of workers.—E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Sedalia, March 18.—There have been ten additions to the East Broadway Christian Church since I became pastor; four were by baptism. We took up our offering for foreign missions the first Sunday in March.—W. F. HAMANN.

MONTANA.—Bozeman, March 14.—We began a meeting here yesterday. At the morning service the house was full. In the evening many were turned away, who could not get in. Four added at the close of first day. Brother McHargue is a fine pastor. This is a fine church and all are hopeful and expecting a good meeting.—LAWRENCE WRIGHT AND SMITH.

NEBRASKA.—Pawnee City, March 12.—I have to report that we more than doubled the apportionment for the March offering, raising more than was ever raised for missions in the history of the congregation. We had three added by relation and one by confession at this service. This makes nine that have been added since we took the work here, Jan. 24.—T. A. LINDENMEYER.

Overton, March 17.—All departments of work taking on new life. Button revival in Bible-school, C. E. growing, Junior Endeavors raised over $11 last week to buy chairs for infant class. Prayer-meeting organized last night to study the Acts of the Apostles in connection, and two confessed Christ at the close. Splendid audiences and interest by all.—O. L. ADAMS, pastor.

NEW MEXICO.—Roswell, March 13.—The pastorate of C. C. Hill opens most hopefully here. He strikes a responsive chord on all hands. There have been a number of additions already, with several baptisms. On the evening and night of the 2nd inst the elegant

Reward of Merit.

A New Catarrh Cure Secures National Popularity in Less than One Year.

Throughout a great nation of eighty million it is a desperate struggle to secure even a recognition for a new article to say nothing of achieving popular favor, and yet within one year Stuart's Catarrh

Tablets, the new catarrh cure, has met with such success that to-day it can be found in every drug store throughout the United States and Canada.

To be sure a large amount of advertising was necessary in the first instance to bring the remedy to the attention of the public, but everyone familiar with the subject knows that advertising alone never made any article permanently successful. It must have in addition absolute, undeniable merit, and this the new catarrh cure certainly possesses in a marked degree.

Physicians, who formerly depended upon inhalers, sprays and local washes or ointments, now use Stuart's Catarrh Tablets because, as one of the most prominent stated, these tablets contain in pleasant, convenient form all the really efficient catarrh remedies, such as red gum, blood root and similar antiseptics.

They contain no cocaine nor opiate, and are given to little children with entire safety and benefit.

Dr. J. J. Reitiger, of Covington, Ky., says: "I suffered from catarrh in my head and throat every fall, with stoppage of the nose and irritation in the throat affecting my voice and often extending to the stomach, causing catarrh of the stomach. I bought a fifty cent package of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets at my druggist's, carried them in my pocket and used them faithfully, and the way in which they cleared my head and throat was certainly remarkable. I had no catarrh last winter and spring and consider myself entirely free from any catarrhal trouble."

Mrs. Jerome Ellison, of Wheeling, W. Va., writes: "I suffered from catarrh nearly my whole life and last winter my two children also suffered from catarrhal colds and sore throat so much they were out of school a large portion of the winter. My brother who was cured of catarrhal deafness by using Stuart's Catarrh Tablets urged me to try them so much that I did so and am truly thankful for what they have done for myself and children. I always keep a box of the tablets in the house and at the first appearance of a cold or sore throat we nip it in the bud and catarrh is no longer a household affliction with us."

Full sized packages of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are sold for fifty cents at all druggists.

home of J. M. Miller was opened for a handsome reception given to Brother Hill and family. H. M. Bandy went to Albuquerque under the A. C. M. S. within the last two weeks. A great opportunity, and Bro. B. will build a good church there.—JESSE B. HASTON.

NEW YORK.—Buffalo, March 14.—Another confession yesterday—a most excellent lady. Spoke at the German Y. M. C. A. at 3:30 P. M. Our great new Central Y. M. C. A., (opened to the public not long ago) cost almost $400,000, and is the finest in U. S.—B. S. FERRALL, Jefferson St. Church.

Syracuse, March 13.—Meetings at Central Church, with F. O. Fannon as evangelist, are progressing encouragingly. Ten added yesterday; $75 raised for foreign missions.—WM. D. RYAN.

OHIO.—Massillon, March 14.—P. H. Welshimer, Canton, Ohio, assisted me in a three weeks' meeting in which there were 24 additions—all by confession and baptism. The weather and an epidemic of sickness threatened to put a stop to our progress, and did hinder us greatly, but only three or four services failed to bring responses to the invitation. Our people were highly pleased with Brother Welshimer. He is a strong gospel preacher and a sweet-spirited man. Our offering for foreign missions yesterday resulted in $465.32, with others yet to hear from. This, with the offering from the Sunday-school, will make us a living link. Our people rejoice over this excellent showing. We also had two additions yesterday. I go to New Philadelphia this evening to begin a meeting, assisting Brother Reynolds.—GEORGE DARSIE, JR.

Springfield, March 17.—Bro. W. S. Priest, of Columbus, O., assisted us in a splendid meeting here which closed Lord's day a week ago. The meeting lasted four weeks, with Brother Priest preaching during the week and myself on the Lord's days. Thirty-three were added, 23 being by confession and baptism. Brother Priest added many to his congregation while holding our meeting. His preaching was all any could ask, clear, powerful, persuasive, entertaining, sympathetic, apostolic. Much good was done. Seven others added recently, six of them by confession and baptism. The work is quite prosperous.—W. A. HARP.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.—Blackburn, March 14.—We are building an elegant stone church house at this place. Preach here once per month and are having additions at every service. Four added to the church at Skedee first Lord's day. Three added at Cleveland yesterday. Will send an offering from all of these points for foreign missions.—M. F. INGRAHAM.

Cherokee, March 14.—Three by letter and two confessions here yesterday. Also baptized three, and one other confession from Ashley, O. T., resulting from Brother Barnes' meeting at that place.—M. B. INGLE.

Kingfisher, March 14.—Ten accessions last night; 37 to date. The interest is great. Brother Talmage Stanley leads the chorus with his cornet. We also have a piano and organ. There are 40 in the choir. Began our Sunday school revival March 6. Yesterday there was an increase of 45. Brother Marshall's sermons are plain and convincing.—ISOM ROBERTS.

Cleo, March 14.—Preached last night to good audience in courthouse at Watonga, and almost the entire audience joined the New Testament Reading Circle, and a dozen or two joined yesterday at the Sunday-school, the pastor among the number, at Geary, where I made a talk. If you will read through the New Testament at least one time within one year, send your name to me at Theo, Tex.—THOS J. EASTERWOOD.

Guthrie, March 19.—The Oklahoma Ministerial Institute convenes at Norman, May 10-12. A fine program is about ready for publication. Bro. M. M. Davis, of Dallas, Texas, is the chief speaker. His subjects involve some of the fundamentals in Christianity. Let all the preachers of Oklahoma be present.—J. T. OGLE.

OREGON.—Monmouth, March 13.—Our protracted meeting with home forces closed today with 13 confessions and six otherwise.—Bro. J. A. Brown is our pastor.—F. S. POWELL.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Sandy Lake, March 15.—One young man was baptized here Sunday; several more to follow. I am in a meeting at Millageville now; good audiences and good interest. We took collection for foreign missions Sunday night. You may hear from this field later.—THOMAS MARTIN.

SOUTH DAKOTA.—Oacoma, March 11.—O. E. Palmer, of Armour, was with the church here in a two weeks' meeting. There were no additions, largely due to the severe weather. The church, however, unites in pronouncing him a sincere, large-hearted, able preacher of the truth. He is invited to come again. While Brother Palmer was preaching at Oacoma, I filled his pulpit at Armour. The brethren made the visit very pleasant for me.—W. J. DODGE.

TEXAS.—Fort Worth, March 14.—On yesterday, March 13, there were two accessions to the Tabernacle Church and also one baptism.—JAMES S. MYERS.

Beaumont, March 12.—I am holding a meeting at this place, and will be here until the first of May.—B. J. WAUGH.

Death by Neglect.

Dr. D. M. Bye, the eminent specialist, of Indianapolis, who cures cancer by the use of a combination of oils, says thousands of persons die from cancer every year from no cause save neglect. If taken in time not one case in a thousand need be fatal. The fear of the knife or the dread of the burning, torturing plaster causes a few to neglect themselves till they pass the fatal point. By far the greater portion die because their friends or relatives, on whom they are dependent, are insensible to their suffering and impending danger till it is too late. If you have friends afflicted write to-day for free book, giving particulars. Address Dr. D. M. BYE Co., Drawer 505, Indianapolis, Ind.

A Preacher's Story of His Work. By W. S. Rainsford, Rector of St. George's Church, New York City. (The Outlook Co. $1.25 net.)

Twenty years ago Dr. Rainsford, then but little over thirty years old, took charge of a dying Episcopal church in a section of lower New York where there were masses of people, but almost none of the sort to which Protestant churches can usually appeal for support. The church had less than 500 members and was accomplishing absolutely nothing. Today the church has 5,000 members and there are 3,000 non-members, mostly young people, enrolled in its various organizations. To find what people need and give it to them in such form as they will receive it, is in brief Dr. Rainsford's prescription for successful church work. In his case it has involved doing some unconventional things which have been freely criticised from the outside, but the work has been done and the church has passed from impotence to power. Dr. Rainsford was born and raised in Ireland, did his first mission work in the depths of east London, spent a few years as curate in Norwich, England, where he acquired a reputation as an evangelistic preacher, came to America and did an itinerant evangelistic work among the Episcopal churches for two or three years, and then settled in Toronto as a rector of the Cathedral Church. About this time there came a change of theological views, threatening for a time to ruin his ministry. He had been ultra-orthodox and had produced a great religious revival by the most dogmatic preaching of the old doctrines. In the transition to a new and firmer basis of faith his work suffered. Then came the call to New York, and he began his work there with the thrill of a new discovery—that God is the father of all men, and that the preacher's business is to call wandering children back home and not to inject into men something which is essentially foreign to their nature. The thorough conviction of this truth, deepened by the struggle which it had cost and a consuming zeal for the correlative truth,—that all men are brethren because children of the common Father,—have been the underlying principles upon which Dr. Rainsford's remarkable work among the poor in New York has been built. One may think what he pleases about some of the methods which he has employed in his institutional work, but one cannot help being thrilled and stimulated by this vivid narrative of experiences. It is a book which the preacher may well keep by him and read over occasionally, (it can be read in an evening) whenever he feels that his ministry is in danger of becoming conventional and perfunctory. Take this wise sentence as an example: "I think it absolutely wrong that a man should be obliged to profess belief in the Apostles' Creed before he is admitted to the church; I should rather lay emphasis on his willingness to serve the Master: the sooner the church takes that ground the better." "If you are true to yourself you cannot preach a thing until you are fully persuaded of it in your own mind; and when you are once fully persuaded you cannot hold your tongue." "Being unnatural is the great secret of loss of power in the pulpit: as soon as men stand in the pulpit things change: there are certain things they feel they must not say—unfortunately often the best things they have to say—their convictions must be toned down, very often just the convictions that do not want to be toned down."

Perversion of Sex and the degradation of woman growing out of her economic dependence"—this is the sub-title of this startling volume. It contains a vast and varied indictment of modern society for sins and crimes growing directly or indirectly out of sex relations; and it argues that the prevention of these is to be accomplished by freeing woman from her inherited bondage, making her industrially free and self-dependent, so that the determining fact of her career will not be that she is a woman, but that she is a person. The book contains a great deal of detailed and disgusting description of moral monstrosities, but the author is right in saying that the iniquities which exist are not cured by ignoring them. It is indecent in the same sense that the most lurid works of Zola and Tolstoy are indecent—in giving an unblushing presentation of the vilest sins. It is moral in the same sense that they are moral—in using these presentations to show that sin is horrible. But it lacks the saving artistic quality which enabled these great realists to send home their shafts with a maximum of force and a minimum of offence to the reader's sense of the proprieties.

The Twentieth Century New Testament. A Translation into Modern English. Complete in one volume. (Revell. $1.00 net.)

The public is already sufficiently familiar with the large merits and few failings of this admirable and unique translation of the New Testament. Since it was first published in the two-volume edition it has had some imitators but no equals. Working from the best Greek text, and not merely paraphrasing earlier English versions, a translation has been produced which, while it lacks that savor of sanctity which long usage and holy associations have given to the authorized version, has gained vastly in clearness and vividness. This rendering into "modern English" becomes, almost of necessity, a commentary as well as a translation, for it forces the translator to substitute clear-cut words for phrases which have either become ambiguous or have been worn so smooth that they carry almost no meaning. To give one a renewed sense of the reality of the New Testament events, we can heartily recommend a re-reading of this book.

PETTIT.

David Pettit entered into life's fullness, Feb. 29, 1904. At the time of his going he was 82 years of age. He was born in Troy, Ohio, but spent many years in Iowa, Kansas and Missouri. We knew him and his devoted wife intimately in Topeka, Kans., being together charter members of the North Side Church. Mr. and Mrs. Pettit were father and mother to the little congregation, and their home was a haven to all who came and went on the King's business. When the "Little Mother," as we all loved to name her, was called by our Father beyond our sight, the very foundations of life were shaken for her husband. But he rallied bravely and went steadily forward. Then came the call to his beloved son Frank, the pastor at Alcott, Col.; still his steadfast faith did not waver. The comfort of God's love, the fellowship of his service and the affection of his daughter and two sons sustained him. He was with his daughter, Mrs. T. C. Lamborn, Kansas City, Kans., when the call came to him. He was ready, for he had wrought faithfully, steadfastly and patiently through the years. Indianapolis, Ind.

He confessed Christ about six years ago, and was baptized, and has since been a strong believer, ever manifesting a deep interest in the cause of Christ. On June 10 of last year, he met with a serious accident in a mine at Funnellton, W. Va. He was a great sufferer till the Lord called him home. Words cannot express our gratitude to the many friends who ministered to his wants. My own brother, in the flesh and in the Lord, has gone to his reward in the prime of life. Washington, D. C. FINLEY B. SAPP.

STRICKLER.

In the death of Bro. James E. Strickler his family, the Central Church and this community have sustained a severe loss. On Lord's day evening, March 6, the spirit of our beloved brother went home to God. He was born near Pittsburg Pa., in October 1833. He was a direct descendant, on his mother's side, of the family of Washington. In 1847 he became a Christian. In 1860 he was united in marriage to Miss Anna Morledge, of Pennsylvania, and she, with six children, survives him. For eleven years Brother Strickler was superintendent of the Bible-school in the Allegheny Church and also deacon and Elder. For fourteen years he was an honored Elder of the Central Church of Christ in this city and was, up to a few weeks before his death, the chairman of our official board, when, because of failing health, he was made the honorary chairman. He was a loyal friend and helper of every pastor who has served the Central Church, and all of us will sorely feel his loss. Wise in counsel, tender and patient, firm and upright in all his ways, he was just such a man as every preacher delights to have associated with him in the work of the ministry. He was a good man and full of the Holy Spirit and of faith. He loved the Church of God and served it with fidelity. He leaves to his children the priceless legacy of a good name. They, too, are earnest members of the church and will walk in their father's ways. On Wednesday afternoon we tenderly laid his body to rest in beautiful Greenlawn. May the dear Lord comfort his beloved family. WALTER SCOTT PRIEST.

THOMAS.

Samuel Marion Thomas was born at Marietta, O., July 8, 1869; died at Macomb, Ill., Dec. 27, 1903. He attended Eureka College, confessed Christ under the ministry of J. G. Waggoner and, after full preparation, entered the work of the ministry. In 1898 he was married to Miss Carrie Liggett, a classmate. He held pastorates at Chandlerville, Kansas and Lanark, Ill. Failing health compelled him to abandon the work and he and his wife made their home with Mrs. Thomas's mother at Macomb, Ill., until his death. In his death the cause lost an able and efficient minister. Columbus, O.

and Jenneta; by Edna—Martha and one child which died; by Alice—Fielding, Jesse and Andrew; by Mary—Silas, Agnes, James, and may be Calvin." "How many children have you now, Mr. Smith?" asked the chairman. "Forty-two—twenty-one boys and twenty-one girls, and I am proud of every one of them." And Mr. Smith closed his five days' examination.

A plural wife was the next witness. Her parents were Mormons and she was brought up in that faith, taught the propriety of plural marriage, and had never known any different life until after her marriage. She said she met the first wife of Kennedy, the man she married, and they had "a slight interview," and the first wife gave her consent. Afterward she separated from her husband because she "could not stand the pressure any longer." Apostle Lyman, a man with three wives, admitted he knew that in living in polygamy he was disobeying both the law of the land and the rule of the church, but he expected to continue in this way. "So you, an apostle of your church, expecting to succeed Mr. Smith in the presidency," said Senator Hoar, "and in that capacity to receive divine revelations yourself, confess that you are now living, and expect to continue to live, in disobedience to the law of the country, the law of your church and the law of God?" "Yes." "Did Senator Smoot know you were living with plural wives?" "The people knew, but Senator Smoot did not." "If the people knew, how was it Senator Smoot did not?" Senator Hoar wanted to know what the witness meant by such answers, and then Apostle Lyman conceded that probably Senator Smoot knew just as much about it as the people. "Do you take back what you said then?" asked Hoar. "I take that back." "Don't you think, Mr. Apostle, that it behooves you to be a little careful about what you say so that you will not have anything to take back?" Then the Yankee inquisitor wanted to know if the witness had received a revelation concerning what he was to testify, and whether such a revelation could be responsible for his change of mind. "Are your answers here by order of the Lord? Are they given in your human or inspired capacity?" "I answer as the Spirit of the Lord directs." "Then it was the Spirit of the Lord which directed you to make the answer you just took back and which you said was a mistake?" Lyman hesitated. "Well," said Hoar, "if you can't answer, I don't blame you."

The Senate Committee went into the whole business of the Mormon sacred books, revelations, "sealing" and "destroying" marriages "for time" and "for eternity," laws of inheritance, Mormon missions, the marriage ceremony, the power of the church in elections and legislations, etc. To consider the testimony in Apostle Teasdale's case, which is declared "unprintable," they were obliged to go into executive session. The case is making a deep impression in the Senate, and as far as the vision from the dome reaches, the people are shocked by the confessions before the committee. Conservative Senators, however, feel they must go slow in punishing a Senator for the delinquencies of the church to which he belongs. They are afraid of establishing a precedent. The bearing of the whole thing upon politics is being seriously considered. Already it is suggested to postpone a vote till the next session of Congress, when the elections shall have been held. Then there will be no danger of alienating the Mormon vote in the Rocky Mountain states. Meantime the country can hold its nose, President Smith can sit down to a good many quiet little family dinners with forty-eight plates, and the daily bombardment of Port Arthur can go on.

Family Circle

Quite Too Sweeping.

There was once a woman so woefully neat
That she swept her whole family into the street.

She lectured on tidiness day after day, Till the children ran off to the neighbor's to play,
And sometimes the "lord of the manor" would roam

From his beautiful house, which was never a home.

'Twas a splendid expression of beauty and art,
But it did not possess home's one requisite—heart.

But this woman worked on with her brush and her broom,

With her servants she battled through room
after room:

She waxed and she polished her beautiful floors

Till her friends hardly ventured inside of her doors.

Her carpets, so velvety, one would refuse
To walk on until he had dusted his shoes:
Her chairs all so tidy, without and within,
That to sit on them seemed little less than a sin.

Her children had toys which they never could spread

O'er immaculate floors; nor could cookies or bread

Be eaten where crumbs might be scattered about,

For her house was like "waxwork" within and without.

Of dust just the least little innocent bit
Would bring on a something akin to a fit,

And a tidy or picture a trifle awry
Could never escape her most diligent eye.

Her children grew up and they hurried away
As soon as they could, scarcely caring to stay Where brooms were a-whisking; they sighed for a nest,

Still neat, but inviting a spirit of rest.
And the day when the last of her little ones left

And the home of their smiles was forever bereft.

She said, while for dust she still searched up and down,

"They know I'm the finest housekeeper in town." —Selected.

The Other Little Girl.

"My bed is turned the wrong way.
I don't like it so."

"Well, we can easily turn it right, dear. When Jane gave your room such a fine cleaning yesterday, she changed things about a little, thinking you would like it."

"I don't. I can't look out of the window so well. No, that won't do yet. I don't get the peep out at the lake, where the little boats sail. No—a little the other way, so I can see where the street crosses. If you had to lie here all day, mamma, you'd want to see all you could."

"I'm sure I should, dear," said mamma, in answer to the fretful complaints. "There, is that just right?
Now, here is Jane with your breakfast.
Such a nice breakfast, too, and she has put some pansies on your tray."

"I like pinks better. Pansies have no smell. Well"—a few moments after Jane had left the room—"if she hasn't forgotten to bring the salt!
She's the most careless thing! Eggs without salt!"

"Oh, my dearie! Jane is always trying how she can please you. I'll ring, and she'll come in a moment."

"And then have to go back for the salt. And by the time she gets it here my egg will be cold."

After eating her breakfast, Jessie asked: "Where is the book I was reading last night?"

"Why, I thought you had finished it. I am sure you told me you were reading the last story."

"I was, but there were two or three pages left."

"I sent it over for little Grace Murray to look at. It is hard for her not to be allowed to go anywhere, now that her little brother has the scarlet fever."

"I think you might have asked me."

Jessie turned over on her lounge, thinking herself a sadly abused little girl. She was suffering from a sprained knee, and might not be able to walk for weeks. It still gave her some pain.

"But I could stand that if it were not that everybody seems set on doing something to vex me and make things harder for me."

She knew very well that this was not so, but it pleased her to think she thought so, and to believe herself very unhappy because of it.

In turning, she found her face brought directly opposite the mirror in the opposite corner of the room. In her changes, Jane had given it a different turn across the corner, and now a slight change in the position of the lounge had brought Jessie face to face with herself. No, Jane had not intended it, though we will not say she might not have done so if she could have foreseen.

Jessie glanced at her face, then stared at it.

"You're the crossest, crabbedest, ugliest face I ever saw!"

She had spoken quickly, yet even before she had finished, the look had changed into one of surprise. She tried to bring back the ugly expression, but could not quite succeed, because much of the ugly feeling had gone, leaving the surprise in its place.

"I saw you, though," she said threat-ingly to the face in the glass. "I know now just how you look when you're cross, and you're cross most of the time. Everybody's seen you look just so, and I suppose they're so used to it they don't think anything at all about it. I s'pose you don't think it's anything to be ashamed of; but I do, and I'm ashamed of you."

She looked sternly at the face, shaking her head, and the face looked sternly back at her, shaking its head.
It was amusing, and Jessie laughed.

And then what a change, and another surprise! Could that be the same face?

Ah, well! some of us know very well how suddenly all the pretty things—rosy cheeks and smiles and dimples—which go to make up the beauty of a dear little face, can be turned into frowns and scowls and pouts, or just the other way.

Jessie tried to look cross and stern again, but the effort brought such a funny effect that she had to laugh, which provoked her, so that she almost got the frown back. But the laugh finally got the best of it, and then the small girl lay quiet for a while, gravely studying her face. It was rather a nice little face, she could not help thinking, and no one would have imagined it could look as she had just seen it.

At length she spoke to it.

THAT PAIN IN THE SIDE

There's nothing that will give such speedy relief and cure and at the same time strengthen the side and restore energy as an

Allcock's POROUS PLASTER

A pain in the right side, however, is often caused by thickening of the bile which may lead to gall stones.
The best treatment is to wear an Allcock's Plaster as shown in the illustration, until cured. You'll be surprised to find how soon you are relieved.

REMEMBER—Allcock's Plasters are without question the most successful external remedy in the world to-day, and the safest, for they contain no bella-donna, opium or any poison whatever.

"You, in there, may look just as you please. But I'm going to leave that ugly face in there, and not look so any more, and I'm going to be another little girl."

The idea pleased her as she lay and thought about it.

"You can't see voices; you can only hear them. But an ugly voice, if you could see it, would be just as ugly as an ugly face. It would be black and rough and cloudy. But when a voice is soft and kind and sweet, like mamma's, it would look, oh! like beautiful flowers. I'd like to have a voice like flowers, to go with the other little girl I'm going to be."

"Never mind, Jane."

In a great anxiety to see Jessie's tray exactly easy for her, Jane had spilled a little of the milk on the clean napkin. And, in her amazement at not hearing a growl because of it, she spilled a great deal more.

"O, dear, if I'm not the orkdest!
See how I've spoiled yer nice-lookin' dinmer. I'll be up here in a minute with another napkin."

"Oh, no; don't go clear down for it, Jane. There's a clean towel on the rack. Spread that on."

Jane gazed at Jessie in a surprise that made her laugh again. She glanced at the little girl in the glass, and saw that she was enjoying it as much as she did.

"It seems to me you're turning over a new leaf, too," she said, nodding approvingly to her, after Jane left the room. "Well, we can both be other little girls. It will be all the more fun."

As the days went by, however—days in which Jessie often suffered pain—it was not always easy to keep on a pleasant face. Old habits are always hard to overcome, and the pretty brow found itself often ready to tie itself into a frown, and the lips to go down at the corners. But then there was that face in the glass. When she was alone with it, Jessie sometimes shook her fist at it.

"You like to show me how ugly I look, don't you? Well, you shan't. I'm another little girl, even if I do look like you sometimes."

But one day she looked pityingly at the girl in the glass. "You poor little thing! As if it wasn't me all the time that makes you look cross and crabbed. You look pleasant soon enough when I do. Well, it's a dreadful shame for any one to make two cross faces, one in and one out of the glass."

Mamma noticed the change which grew into the little face and voice—for the voice, you know, always keeps company with the face—and Jessie sometimes smiled to see her surprise when she was looking for a frown and snarl, and none came.

"She doesn't know I'm another little girl," she whispered to herself in great delight.

But mamma did know. No one who loves a little child can fail to notice when a voice grows gentle and smiles get into a way of crowding away the frowns.

"I think my little girl is cultivating a very sweet spirit of patience," she said one day, putting a loving arm around her.

"O mamma!" Jessie laughed merrily, "you don't know; but it's because I am another little girl."

"You another little girl? No, I should be sorry to think you any one except my own same little girl."

"It's true, though, mamma. But you know I don't get cross and whine at things as I did—I mean, not quite so much."

"That is what I was saying. You are growing patient and sweet-tempered."

"I saw my cross, ugly face in the glass one day, mamma, and I didn't like it a bit. I scolded it, and told it to stay there, and I'd be another little girl."

Mamma laughed.

"Sometimes she got out, and then I put her right back. And then, mamma, I thought it a shame to make her look ugly, when she was always nice when I was. So, I'm trying my very best not to have an ugly face anywhere."

"That's right, my bird," said mamma, kissing her. "When the face outside is in good order, the other surely will be."

Jessie in time was able to walk about as strongly as any one. But when she no longer lay all day in the room, she would sometimes go and take a look into the mirror, smiling as she thought of the time when she resolved to be another little girl.

"You're there yet," she sometimes said, nodding and smiling. "And I

The Raindrop's Story.

One rainy day, as a sprightly little fieldmouse was sitting near the door of his house, greedily chewing a grain of corn, a raindrop fell on a leaf beside him.

"Where did you come from?" asked the fieldmouse, looking anxiously at the raindrop and wondering whether he would get an answer or not.

"From the sky," answered the raindrop, very readily; "but my real home is the sea. One day, as I was playing with my brothers and sisters in that beautiful home of ours, the hot sun shone upon us. It drew many of us up into the sky. I was among them. We could see the green fields and beautiful flowers far beneath. We came close together and formed a white, fleecy cloud. Pretty soon a chilly wind began to blow. We crowded together to get warm. We became so heavy we could not stay up in the clear air. We came tumbling down, and I have alighted here too—" But just then a sparrow, who was very thirsty, gobbled the raindrop up so quickly that he did not have time to finish his story.

Every little raindrop has its work to do, just as every little child has. If this one had not gone to quench the thirst of one of God's sparrows, it might have given new life to a blade of grass or a pretty flower of the field. God cares for all his little creatures and gives each one work to do for him. —Selected.

Grumble-Boy and Smiley-Boy.

In the Jones house there were two small boys, Johnnie Grumble-boy and Johnnie Smiley-boy, but no one ever saw both at once. At first they hardly realized, this little boy's father and mother and Aunt Emma, that there were two boys; but when one morning a little chap came down to breakfast with a big frown on his face, and blue eyes that were so cross that they looked nearly black, and when pleasant remarks from the family had no effect in making the boy look pleasant, they were obliged to make up their minds that a strange little boy had come to take the place of their pet. So they treated him with all the ceremony necessary with a stranger, and pretty soon he found himself feeling strange and queer.

But he wouldn't tell anyone that he felt strange. Not a bit of it. He was not that kind of a boy. When he came down feeling that way, why, everything was wrong. The oatmeal was too salty, his milk didn't taste right, and his egg was boiled too hard. And he just didn't want to wear his old cap to kindergarten. It wasn't comfortable at all.

This sort of thing went on for some time, until Aunt Emma made up her mind that some remedy must be thought out. The mornings when Smiley Johnnie came down there was the happiest little boy around the house all day, and home was a very different place from what it was on Grumble-boy's days.

So auntie thought and thought, and one day when Johnnie came down, and it was the Grumble-boy Johnnie who climbed to the seat beside father, he found a great change in the atmosphere of the family table. Usually when he came down looking frowning and sour, and complained about everything, the kind members of his family tried to persuade him by cheerfulness that things were not as far wrong as he thought them. But to-day it was different.

"This hominy is too hot," piped a small voice.

"It is entirely too hot," Aunt Emma agreed, sulkily.

"Mine's burning my mouth," mother said softly.

"Mine's simply scalding," growled father.

Grumble-boy looked up, surprised, and for five minutes there wasn't another word said.

Then came the boiled eggs and toast.

"My egg's too hard," growled Grumble-boy before he thought, just because he was in the habit of saying it when he felt cross.

"So's mine," wailed auntie.

"And mine," sobbed mother.

"Mine's like a rock, it's so hard," growled father.

Grumble-boy could hardly keep from smiling, it was all so like the good old story of Silverlocks and the three bears, but he'd come downstairs feeling cross, and it was his habit to stay cross.

And then the finish came when some lovely hot griddle-cakes were brought on. Grumble-boy wanted to complain, just because he felt like it, so after he'd poured maple-sirup over his cake he touched it with his fork and grumbled:

"Are't they?" sighed Aunt Emma.
"I can't hardly cut mine," wailed mother in a tearful voice.

Father started to cut his just then and so did all the others, and at the same time father growled:

"Shame to send such tough cakes to the table," and the cakes simply fell apart on their forks, and everybody burst into a roar of laughter.

After that, when by chance the Grumble-boy appeared at breakfast, it was enough for auntie to say:

"Hello, are your cakes tough this morning, boy?" to break the clouds and bring back the sunshine.—The Examiner.

So Different.

"Papa, how often do you have to get the carriage horse shod?"

"Oh, I don't know, Tommy. Whenever the coachman says the horse needs a new set of shoes I tell him to go to the blacksmith's and have them put on."

"How much does it cost when he has to have a new set?"

"I don't know. I leave that to the coachman."

"Don't you ever ask him what's the reason the horse wears them out so fast?"

"Certainly not."

"Don't you ever make any fuss about the expense?"

"No. Why should I?"

Out of His Jurisdiction.

One day recently, says the Rochester Post-Express, a certain justice of the Supreme court of that district invited a friend of his, a lawyer, to go sailing with him.

The wind was brisk at the start and it soon freshened, and their little craft began to toss and roll in a manner that caused the lawyer much inward uneasiness.

The judge, reading his friend's plight in his contortions, laid a kind hand on his shoulder, and said:

"My dear fellow, can I do anything for you?"

"Yes, your honor," replied the lawyer. "I wish you would overrule this motion."

CHAPTER V.—CONCLUDED.

George laid down the book and rose softly. Flora did not stir; she was so far out upon the sea of sleep, she could not discover a glimpse of the distant shore through the mists of dreams. He left her lying in the hammock, and strolled thoughtfully away. His course took him to the summer house. Remembering Flora's intention of destroying the rustic bench, he had a whimsical desire to pay it a last visit. He sat down upon one end and tried to imagine Linnie Greer as she sat beside him, two years ago. He thought he could remember better if he lay down. Then he fell asleep. Far away his mind sailed, upon that sea of sleep. Did it meet another vessel sailing there? and did their flags salute each other? Who knows what happens upon that realm of mystery?

At last his mind-ship drew near shore. He saw objects moving upon the beach of life, but they looked strange, for a dreamy haze still hung before his eyes. He heard his own name spoken, and that brought him to anchor in the summer house. He started up. It was dark in the little room, but outside, a pale remembrance of the day lingered in the look of the swiftly forgetting world. He heard Flora talking to the housekeeper. They had paused near the protecting vines.

"He likes to talk about his mother," said Flora, "but he hardly mentions his father."

"His mother and father didn't get along well together," said the voice of Mrs. Binitier. "I've been asking all about 'em since I come here, fur I feel it my dooty to learn all I can about people,—they air my fellowmen. He was a man of books and papers, but she was full of life and society; and why they ever married, I reckon the Lord knows, knowing everything,—but I never pretended to. Being so different, they couldn't sympathize with each other, they was scissors to each other, always crosswise,—they was human beings. When she made her visit to Canada, he wasn't even at home to tell her good-by. Which was to blame, I can't find out, though they do say he married her for her money. And if she was to blame, I wouldn't make mention of it, after her obituary has been in the papers."

"It must have been very hard on George," said Flora, "to see them disagree, while he cared so much for both."

"Not as hard on him as it might have been on you," said Mrs. Binitier; "he is a boy."

They walked to the house, leaving George shivering, though the night-air was warm and delicious. Never before had he heard expressed in words a dumb, shuddering presentiment which at rare moments had visited his heart, the year before his mother's journey to Canada. As he sat in darkness upon the rustic bench, his mind went back to distant days. He remembered the sadness that had sometimes come into his mother's eyes because his father, too engrossed in editorial labors, knew more about the doings of the President's than of his own household. In his younger days, she could coax him from his work, and they would stroll together upon the lawn, but those sweet walks of confidence and love became more rare and finally ceased. The last year before the Canada trip, father and mother occupied separate rooms; the reason given was Mr. Clayton's increasing illness, which required that he should be alone. George had never discovered any exhibition of unfriendliness between his parents, but he had missed a certain genial sympathy which had once been the breath of the home. Mr. Clayton was often away, that last year; but his proprietorship of several papers required this absence. That he was gone at the time his mother left home was explained with a business reason. It had appeared unfortunate to George,—certainly not premeditated. The last night, when he discovered his mother sobbing violently in her room, she caught him to her bosom, gasping, "Tell your father I left him my—" Then she had paused, adding, "No, tell him nothing; I will write." She did write but to George, not to her husband. She described her journey, and her arrival at his aunt's in Canada. It was a letter breathing a mother's devotion, and it showed the trace of tears. Soon after came the telegram telling how she had been drowned while out skating. On hearing the news, Mr. Clayton had shut himself up in his room, and for several days would see no one.

Since that time, George, when he thought of his mother, placed her in the bright years before that last period of uneasiness. But while he had been recalling the brightness in his parents' lives, the neighbors had persistently thought of the shadow! Had there in truth been a shadow? Had his mother's death come after a year of estrangement? Had illness and business been mere excuses for living in different parts of the house, and for prolonged absences? It seemed almost sacrilege to admit the fear. His parents had never deceived him, and the uneasiness which he had sometimes felt in their presence, and which Mrs. Binitier's words had brought back, surely did them wrong. He reproached himself for suffering that fear to torture him, now that his mother was dead, and unable to allay it.

"It is not true!" he thought; "there was no difference between them, and I am wicked sometimes to suspect a change in their manner toward each other. I will never believe it, and I will not let the thought trouble me again." It was a great relief to put from him that painful impression, and to feel that it was forever dismissed. Peace once more soothed his troubled mind, and the fragrant breath of the night whispered of repose. He lay down again, and again fell asleep.

How long he lay insensible, he did not know. What happened while he lay there, was hidden from him. Was he all the time alone? Was his dream a part of the truth? Was the stillness broken other than by his breath? He became restless, and a murmur escaped his lips. "Oh!" he whispered.

"Where—mother—mother—"

A girlish laugh rang upon his ears. He started up. The ground outside the door was white with the moonlight.

Flora Stoner stood at the entrance. "The lost is asleep!" she cried. "Do you know how late it is? We are going to lock the doors. Did you dream of Linnie Greer on her bench? Oh, George!"

"I believe I was asleep," said George, rising in confusion. The next moment he uttered a sharp exclamation.

"Don't fall!" cried Flora, running to to him and catching his arm. "Wake up, George!"

"I am awake," said the other in a strange voice. "Oh, Flora! Do you notice that perfume? Is it from you?"

Flora sniffed thoughtfully. "Isn't it delicate and violet-like!" she exclaimed.

"That's it," said the other in confusion. "Sweet violet perfume, you know. Do you use it?"

"Is this a joke?" asked Flora. "You know it isn't my perfume. You were just pretending to sleep!"

"Oh, no! But, I had such a queer dream. And sweet violet was what my mother always used."

"Let's hurry to the house," said Flora quickly. "It is ever and ever so late, and Spot has gone to bed. It looks so lonesome out here! The moon always does,—like a poor old bachelors!"

"It must have been Mrs. Binitier," said George, as they hastened away.

"Yes, there's nobody else," said Flora.

Publishers' Notes.

Nearly all the lessons on the Life of Christ are taken from the synoptics, so that J. S. Lamar on Luke ($1.50), with McGarvey on Matthew and Mark will readily be used by those wanting the best in connection with our lessons.

J. W. McGarvey is always in demand for his pointed and terse way of teaching the truth, but is most helpful in his Matthew and Mark commentary, which sells for $1.50, and will be in use in the study of many of the lessons during these six months.

The demand for the Normal Instructor, in seven parts, at 15 cents each, continues; and why not if one wishes to have the best in connection with our studies in the Life of Christ? W. W. Dowling has no superior in such work. The various parts are clear, simple and pointed. $1.50 per doz.

Few men were better than B. A. Hinsdale as a teacher, and he did some of his best work in "Jesus as a Teacher" ($1.25), and it is especially appropriate in our present lessons, helping us often to look at the lesson just as the Master faced the issue in dealing with the people or problem.

The American Revised Bible by the Nelsons, is now in the Teacher's edition, and has concordance and helps needed in a Twentieth Century Bible. The prices run from $2.25 to $10, with the indexed at 35 cents additional. Every minister and all good teachers ought to use the American Standard edition of the Revised Bible.

There has come to us the opportunity to assist in introducing the Revised Version by offering the New Testament in nonpareil, limp cloth, red edges at seven cents; full cloth, red edge, at 15 cents; and in long primer, silk cloth, red edges, size of book, five by seven inches, at 35 cents. Think of that. These prices are postpaid, too.

That was a most fortunate idea of G. A. Hoffmann, "The Minister's Pastoral Memorandum and Records," as it so aptly meets the desires of so many of our ministers wanting a pocket record of the membership, list of officers, missionary societies, church committees, Bible-school officers and teachers, young people's societies, marriages performed, funerals preached, sermons delivered, subscriptions for church papers, and many other items which the busy minister needs recorded. Price only 50 cents, in splendid cloth binding.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumphs speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Peddlers and fakirs frequently take cakes of Ivory Soap, remove the name, cut them into small pieces, wrap these in tin foil and sell them at a high price as a new and wonderful cleanser. Those who have tried it say that nothing is better than Ivory Soap for taking out spots and for similar special uses. Ivory Soap is a powerful cleanser, but pure and safe.

Longevity of Animals.

Insects live some only a few hours, others for weeks. The toad lives about 15 years.

Buffon speaks of carp in the pond of Count de Maurepas, at Pontchartram, proved to be more than 150 years old.

A pike caught in a lake near Hellbronn, in 1497, showed by a brass ring attached to it that it had been placed in the lake in 1230.

River trout have lived confined in wells 30 to 50 years.

Domestic fowls and other gallinaceous animals live 12 to 15 years.

The Grand Duchess d'Uabino, when, in 1633, she came to Florence to marry the Grand Duke Ferdinand, brought with her a parrot, "the oldest member of her family." It lived in Florence nearly a century longer.

Storks will live for more than a century.

The camel lives 40 years; the horse lives 30 years; the ox lives 20 years; the dog lives 12 years; the cat lives 10 years; the sheep lives 9 years; the rabbit lives 8 years; the guinea-pig lives 7 years.

Aristotle says that the elephant lives 200 years; the East Indians say 300. An elephant whose age was not known when captured lived afterward in captivity 130 years.

The age of the whale, as computed by the laminae of whalebone in its jaws, reaches at least 400 years.

Current Events

For the first time in the history of our government, a United States Senator has been convicted of using his official position for private gain.

A Senator Convicted.

Senator Joseph R. Burton, of Kansas, was employed at a salary of five hundred dollars a month by the Rialto Grain & Securities Company to look out for the interests of that concern in Washington, and especially to "keep the Post Office Department in good humor." The reason for the apprehension of ill humor on the part of the department was that the Rialto Company was a get-rich-quick concern, which, if not actually violating the postal laws, was at least coming dangerously near it, and had to defend itself against many complaints. Disreputable as the concern was, the conviction of Senator Burton was not based upon the crookedness of the Company which he represented, but upon his violation of the federal statute which forbids any member of Congress to accept compensation for services rendered to any individual or corporation before a department of the government in any matter in which the United States is interested. The accused was found guilty on six counts of the indictment, and the maximum punishment for each offense is two years imprisonment and a fine of ten thousand dollars. An appeal has been taken and there will doubtless be a long legal fight before the matter is finally settled. The grounds for the appeal are entirely technical. Senator Burton still retains his seat in the Senate, but he has not occupied it since the indictment was brought against him, and probably will not until the appeal is decided. It is not expected that the Senate will take any action toward expelling him until he has exhausted his right of appeal. His conviction will not of itself involve his expulsion from the Senate, for the Constitution guarantees that the Senate shall be the sole judge of the qualifications of its members.

With the exception of those Senators who were expelled at the beginning of the civil war when their states had seceded from the Union, there have been only two cases of expulsion in the entire history of the Senate: Blount, of Tennessee, in 1797, and Bright, of Indiana, in 1862. In the latter case the charge was disloyalty to the federal government.

The agreement finally reached between the united mine workers of America in nine of the central states and the operators, clears up a situation which gave promise of much trouble. The operators claimed that the advance which they had granted two years ago was too great, and proposed a reduction of 15 per cent in the scale. The miners held for a maintenance of the present scale, and in some cases a further advance, and were unwilling to sign a two years' contract. By the influence of President John Mitchell, a compromise was effected by which a reduction of about five and a half per cent and a two years' contract were agreed to, by a vote of the local unions. The advantage of peaceful methods of argument and conciliation, as illustrated by Mr. Mitchell's work among the bituminous coal miners over the methods of strike, lock out and boycott, which have recently found illustration among the building trades in New York, are too obvious to require comment. Mr. Mitchell has by his upright and reasonable course won the confidence both of the miners and of the operators, and the success of the work, in spite of the many difficulties, affords a convincing illustration of the value of character in the business world. The labor problem can never be fought out. It must be thought out and wrought out by men who are capable of commanding the confidence of both parties to the controversy.

Strikes Averted.

The death of Sir Edwin Arnold will create little stir. Noted as a writer and especially as a poet of Eastern lore, he was at one time more than famous. From schoolmaster in England he became head of the Deccan College at Poona, Bombay, where he became infatuated with the Hindoo philosophy. Returning to England, he entered upon a journalistic career, and finally became the editorial head of the daily paper whose peculiar style of diction has coined for us the word "Telegraphese." The Daily Telegraph under Arnold and George Augustus Sala, the one a writer of poetic charm, and the other gifted with the ability to make any subject interesting, won a very wide circulation. "The Song of Songs" was Arnold's first important contribution putting into English verse the life and thought of the East. But it was the appearance of his "Light of Asia" that made Arnold the idol of London and New York drawing-rooms. This work in verse of distinct grace and charm presented the life of Buddha, together with an exposition of the doctrines of Nirvana and Karma, and a picture of the scenery and manners of the Hindoostan of 2,000 years ago. Sir Edwin wrote many other poems, but only one of special note. This appeared in 1891, and followed in title and style his earlier success, though "The Light of the World" was of course an attempt to do for Christ what the poet had already done for Buddha. Sir Edwin spent much time in Eastern lands, and became so devoted to Japan that a few years ago he brought a Japanese lady to London as his wife. It is worth noting that this marriage did not add to his popularity.

County conventions are now being held throughout Missouri, and it is interesting to note their attitude toward the boodle question. Many of them are electing Folk delegates, and it seems that if the will of the people is allowed to register itself at the polls, Mr. Folk's chances of election are improving. As an example of the attitude of the opposition, its eagerness to hush up all scandal and its indifference to the issues which are most vitally important, the action of the Randolph County Democratic convention, which met on Monday, is significant. The following resolution on the boodle question was ruled out of order:

Be it resolved, That in our opinion bribery is the treason of peace, and the boodler, whether bribe-giver or bribe-taker, is a traitor to the state, and that we cannot too highly praise, nor too steadfastly sustain those Democrats in office who have been engaged in the great work for the people, of uncovering and prosecuting the boodlers of St. Louis and Jefferson City; and we believe that boodling is an issue, and we further believe that good government and the best interests of all citizens of our state demand home rule for our cities.

When this embarrassing reminder of the recent scandals had been disposed of, a series of resolutions was adopted, beginning as follows:

That we point with pride to the glorious record made by the Democratic party of Missouri. Under the honest, prudent, wise and economical administration of Alexander M. Dockery, our able chief executive, the last dollar of the bonded indebtedness has been paid. We cheerfully and heartily, therefore, indorse the official course of Gov. Dockery and his faithful co-workers in the splendid administration of the affairs of the state.

That we regret and deplore the action of some Democratic mass meetings and county conventions, recently held in the state, in passing resolutions, unjustly and without right or excuse, attacking our worthy and most excellent chief executive and our state administration and party organization. We are firm in the conviction that such proceedings are unwise, unjustifiable and unDemocratic. Such a course tends to disrupt and wreck our party.

After such declarations as these, it is of little consequence to declare that "we denounce corruption and crime in high or low places." The issue in Missouri is between honesty and dishonesty in office. So far as the three largest cities in the state are concerned, the issue is between government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and government of the machine, for the machine, and by the machine. It is not likely that any person or persons who believe that it is un-Democratic to oppose and expose those influences which are disgracing the name of a great party, and making merchandise of the popular loyalty to it, will be able to contribute anything of value to the solution of the problem which now confronts the people of this state.

We are not disposed to lay a great deal of stress upon Republican comments on the situation in Missouri—not that Democrats in Missouri are necessarily incapable of making a correct estimate of it, but because there is an inevitable suspicion of partisanship. We are most interested in the attitude of the Democracy. Congressman W. D. Vandiver (Dem.) has this to say with reference to the attack upon Mr. Folk's party loyalty:

It is shameful and surprising indeed, that the chief executive of the state should attempt to apologize for the condition of things by making an attack on Folk's Democracy. The mistake which the governor makes is in assuming that he is the party, and that holding him responsible because the police commissioners are his appointees, and they winked at these outrages, he considers an attack on the party.

Is it party treason for Democrats to criticise Democratic officials? Then he is guilty of a most palpable act of treason, when he assails the conduct and the motives of a Democratic circuit attorney, who has so faithfully discharged his duties that he has earned the plaudits of good citizens in every state in the Union, and incurred the mortal enmity of the criminal classes everywhere.

In addition to all this, another new feature has arisen in Missouri politics. For the first time in this generation four candidates are running for the governorship nomination of Missouri, with three of them running against one. Hawes' name appears on the ticket against Folk in Carter and Mississippi counties, while Reed emphatically refused to allow his name to go on the ticket. Reed runs against Folk in Howell and Schuyler counties, and neither Hawes' nor Gantt's name appears on the ticket. In other words, they are running only in spots; Folk is the only candidate for governor of Missouri who is running in every county of the state.

Perhaps the most interesting phenomenon in the campaign is the predicament of those Democratic leaders and papers who admit and deplore the present corrupt conditions, and yet do not know how to translate these admissions and regrets into terms of political action without seeming to insult the party to which they are sincerely attached. The attitude of the St. Louis Republic is the case in point. No paper has reported more fully or denounced more unsparingly the outrageous misconduct of recent elections in St. Louis, than has the Republic. Yet it has found itself unable to see any political significance in these conditions. Hence we find it uttering such non-committal sentiments as this: "The people do not need to be told that Mr. Folk has done a great work in prosecuting bribe-givers and bribe-takers. Without being told in contentious promulgations, they know that the present state administration has been honest, financially successful and free from association with lobyism." However free the state administration may be from "lobyism," the outstanding fact in the minds of those who dwell in the cities of Missouri, and especially in St. Louis, is that the governor of the state appoints the police commissioners, the excise commissioner and the election commissioners, and that these control the forces, the abuse of which has been the cause of those very outrages which the Republic itself, as a good newspaper, has faithfully reported.

Another American wedge has begun to cleave its way into "British interests." And this is far more vital to the country than most Englishmen are yet willing to admit. But some of the most thoughtful of the island kingdom's citizens are in every possible way encouraging this American invasion of scientific American education. The time has gone by when a bishop of the Church of England can, as one did a few years ago, give public expression to such a muddled sentiment as, "I would rather see England free than sober." People are now awakening to the fact that a country can only be free when it is sober. Mr. Mosely and every one of his fellow-commissioners emphasized the comparative sobriety of the American workingman as a strong reason for his happy condition. While this commission has done much to direct public attention to the matter a movement inaugurated by physicians for the adoption by Great Britain of the educational method against drink has more promise in it than any scheme yet promulgated for fighting the national habit. For many years the late Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson and Dr. Norman Kerr were almost the only staunch advocates among British scientific men of the temperance idea. Their devoted and unwearied efforts have not been without great fruition. Such distinguished scientists and physicians as Sir Lander Brunton, Sir Henry Thompson, Sir William Turner, Prof.

Sims Woodhead, and Sir Victor Horsley, the great brain specialist, whose study of the effect of alcohol on brain tissue has done more perhaps than anything else to convert the medical fraternity to the baneful results of liquor indulgence, have recently, as a committee of the medical association, asked every registered physician in Great Britain and Ireland to unite with them in signing a petition for the compulsory study of the laws of health, including elementary instruction on the nature and effects of alcohol. This petition has already been signed by nearly 15,000 practitioners. It states as its raison d'etre the facts that as members of the profession the signers have constantly before them "the serious physical and moral conditions of degeneracy and disease resulting from the neglect and infraction of the elementary laws of hygiene," that "much of the degeneracy, disease, and accident with which medical men are called upon to deal, is directly or indirectly due to the use of alcohol, and that a widespread ignorance prevails concerning not only the nature and properties of this substance, but also its effects on the body and mind." And in view of the fact of efforts on the part of some people in this country to postpone this instruction to the later years of school life it is worth noting that the British petition insists on the instruction being elementary and given at an early age. It would be strange were the United States to take any backward step just as the European nations are all reaching out towards some methods to check the awful ravages of alcohol.

The Illinois courts have handed down a decision which may have far-reaching consequences. At least it ought to be effective in calling the attention of the thoughtless to the intimate connection between liquor and crime. The point is so important that we quote in full the dispatch in which the decision is reported:

The appellate court, in a decision handed down to-day, holds that saloon keepers are liable for the death of their patrons who meet death while under the influence of liquor sold them by the defendants. The case was that of Kate Algood, who was awarded $3,000 damages against William Botwinis, a saloon keeper of this city, for the death of her husband, George Algood, who had been drinking in the saloon of Botwinis, and who, while on his way home in an intoxicated condition, fell from his buggy and received injuries which resulted fatally.

It is something to get such a positive official statement that whisky and murder may and often do bear the relation of cause and effect. It would seem that before many years it ought to be borne in upon the consciousness of ordinarily sensible people that the state cannot consistently license a man to sell liquor, and then punish him for the consequences which ensue from its consumption.

Unconquered Land—XII.

A Resume.

In this series of articles, which we now close, we have had in view the disabusing of any minds of the idea that we have attained our ideal, as a religious movement, and may rest upon past achievements. We have sought to impress our readers with the magnitude and importance of the work yet remaining to be accomplished by us if we are to fulfill our mission in the world. And this we have aimed to do, not by discounting the value of what we have already done, but by showing that the very nature of our movement demands much more of us, and that past success is the pledge for still greater achievements in the future.

Among the "much land" yet remaining to be conquered, we have called attention to the following tasks:

1. Getting before the world the objects and principles of the reformation of the nineteenth century. A large part of the people in our own country are yet to be taught that there is a religious movement seeking to unite Christians on the simple New Testament basis of fellowship, without a human creed or ecclesiastical court or party name. It was urged that by the much freer use of tracts, books and papers, by the co-operation of the pulpit in a series of Sunday evening discourses, by a more vigorous support of our home missionary operations, and by a more hearty and generous co-operation of our ministers and churches with other religious forces, where this is possible, we could best accomplish this work.

2. Healing our own internal dissensions. We pointed out that the same underlying motive which leads us to seek the union of all Christians should prompt us to seek a more perfect unity among ourselves; moreover, that the same principles of unity which we urge upon the religious world, would, if faithfully adhered to, maintain unity among ourselves. We suggested that representative brethren of differing types of thought among us, as respects missionary societies and other expediences, meet for friendly conferences, looking to oneness of feeling, as brethren, if not to uniformity of methods.

3. Referring to our claim that we are seeking to restore New Testament Christianity—"its creed, its ordinances and its life"—we indicated in a series of three articles that there were unexplored heights and depths in each of these three items, challenging our best thought and our most consecrated living. We tried to point out the relation between the creed and the ordinances, on the one hand, and between the ordinances and the life, on the other, and the fact that the life is the supreme end to which both the creed and the ordinances look. This life, in its most comprehensive sense, must express itself not only in conduct and character, but in forms of organization for high and worthy ends, affecting the welfare of the home, the church and the state. Vast progress is yet required in deepening the spiritual life, before we can furnish to the world the highest proof of the divinity of our mission.

4. The question of our relationship to other religious bodies was then dealt with, since this is fundamental, involving, as it does, a true self-knowledge or understanding of our own position, and of our place in the religious world. In setting forth our relation to other religious forces, we treated the question in the light of history, showing the historic setting of our movement, and pointing out what it holds in common with others, and in what respects it is differentiated from them by its nature and purpose.

5. Reaching the conclusion that our relation to other believers in Christ is that of friends and allies, and not enemies, we have tried to make it clear that this does not involve any lack of fidelity to the principles of our movement, as some seem to think, but that, on the contrary, we can best serve the interest of our fellow Christians by being true to the special work to which we have been called. That it is in co-operation with, and not in isolation from, other forces working for the extension of God's kingdom, that we can most successfully impart to them the truth we hold in trust, and receive from them the lessons they can teach us. The disposition to profit from others and to recognize the Christ-likeness wherever we see it, is the true road to unity.

6. History affords no example of continuous progress, on the part of any religious body, in harmony with its basic principles. Crystallization, under the power of a creed, into a sect, with the consequent disruption of its unity, has been the rule hitherto. Will our own movement prove an exception? It is too early to answer this question, but it is certain that such a fate can be averted only by fidelity to our basic principles: Loyalty to Christ; liberty in Christ; union upon Christ; service for Christ.

7. This continuous progress on our part means, not the departure from those distinctive aims and principles which have given character and success to our movement, but the progressive realization in actual life, and embodiment in practical forms, of such aims and principles. If our Christo-centric view of the Bible and of the Christian system be the correct one, and if our plea that in Him we may be one and free at the same time—one in faith, hope and love, and free to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth—be a true plea, these ruling ideas should find expression in literature, in theology, in practical forms of beneficence, in highest types of Christian character, marked by breadth of mind, spiritual power and consecration of life, and commending itself to all earnest souls by its unceasing efforts to apply the principles of Christ to all the problems of our time—theological, religious, social, political and industrial.

8. Finally, the supreme task we have set before us—the unity of Christians—is yet incomplete. We must not, while congratulating ourselves on what has been done in this direction, suffer ourselves to be deceived with the idea that Christ's prayer for the oneness of his followers has been realized. Much yet remains to be done. But if we are to be leaders in the movement for unity that has gained such an impetus, we must seek to sympathetically interpret, and keep in touch with the efforts of our own time to realize the unity of the Church through the recognition and utilization of the unity which already exists. Especially must we strive to furnish to the world a demonstration, by example, of the practicability and desirability of Christian union.

Such is a brief resume of the things we have been saying in this series of articles. If they shall serve in any degree to stimulate the brotherhood to a more zealous propaganda of the truths they hold in trust, a more worthy appreciation of these truths, and to so impress upon them the magnitude of the work yet remaining to be done, as to lead us all to seek the strength and wisdom which cometh from God, in order that we may worthily carry forward the unfinished tasks bequeathed to us by our fathers, our purpose will have been accomplished.

Power of the Resurrection.

It is well that each recurring Lord's day reminds us of the supreme event which that day commemorates—the resurrection of Christ. It is well, too, that once a year at Eastertide this great corner-stone fact of the gospel should receive special emphasis. We cannot too often be reminded, not only of the fact of the resurrection, but of its meaning and its far-reaching consequences. There is something beautiful and suggestive in the fact that nature herself unites with history at this season of the year in teaching the power of life over death, and in reminding us that resurrection is a universal law of life.

One of the things which the Apostle Paul aspired to beyond all the knowledge which he had acquired of the literature and life of the world, in his time, was to know the power of Christ's resurrection in its fullness. No doubt he had experienced the power of the resurrection as few men of his time or of subsequent times have experienced it, but he felt that there were still larger resources of power contained in that transcendent fact that would render his life still more faithful and fruitful. If this were true of Paul, that he needed to experience in a larger measure the power of the resurrection, how much more true is it of the average Christian of to-day!

There is the fact of the resurrection, and there is the power of the resurrection. With the fact we are familiar; are we equally familiar with the power thereof? The fact is that Jesus Christ on the morning of the third day after his burial, arose from the dead, because it was not possible for him to be holden by the power of death; that he rose to conscious, personal, immortal life, as the demonstration of his divine mission and character, and to enable him to carry forward his great mission of saving the world. It has been said by men of the highest legal training that this is one of the best-attested facts in human history. His repeated appearances to his disciples, and to above five hundred brethren at one time, and the continuity of his work with increasing power through the ages, together with the testimony of chosen witnesses, sealed in most cases by their blood, establish beyond reasonable question the fact of the resurrection.

But what is "the power of his resurrection?" It is the "power of the world to come." It is the "power of an endless life." It is the power of faith looking with open vision upon the reality of the spiritual universe. It is the power of the divine Christ, unseen but ever present, sharing all our burdens, sympathizing with us in our sorrows, strengthening us in our weakness and in the darkest moments and saddest experiences of life, opening to us the door into celestial glories. It is the power that transfigures our human life and makes living worth while.

No wonder Paul longed for the larger knowledge of the power of the resurrection of Christ. Under its magic spell he had been enabled to turn away from the legalism of Judaism, from all his Jewish training and teaching, from all the emoluments and honors which life held out for him, from all the allurements and enticements of the world, and to give himself and his mighty powers with a sublime abandon to the preaching of Christ's gospel and to the advancement of his reign over the hearts and lives of men. It had lifted him above the motives and influences which too often control the lives of men, and brought him under the regnancy of faith and of spiritual realities. That he should desire to drink deeper of this spiritual fountain was most natural in view of what it had already enabled him to accomplish for his Master.

Is it possible for us to live our lives, to perform our daily tasks, to bear our daily burdens and cares, under the power of the resurrection? This is if Christianity be not a spent force. The fact that Christ lives and reigns is assurance that we may know the power of his resurrection and perform our tasks, meet our temptations and develop our characters under the inspiration of the same power which made Paul's life so gloriously triumphant. The Eastertide is valuable to us just in proportion as it helps us to realize this power. In vain is the air laden with the perfume of lilies and our churches filled with the melody of resurrection music or with the eloquence of the resurrection sermon, if these do not help us to know the power of Christ's resurrection as an inspiring and transforming power in our lives, lightening our burdens, quickening our zeal, strengthening our faith, and giving a new joy and dignity to our human lives. It is only as we come thus to know "the power of Christ's resurrection" that we are able to enter into "fellowship with his sufferings," and so share with Him in the work of the world's redemption.

Florida State Convention.

The few Christian churches in Florida which are co-operating in missionary work held their annual convention in Tampa, March 22-24. There are only about a score of churches in the state, with a total membership perhaps of 1,500. There are only about nine ministers in the state, so far as we could learn, who are actively engaged in the work of the ministry. There are some groups of members that have not been formed into churches, and some of these are co-operating with the mission work of the state. We are yet a feeble folk in Florida, as will appear from these statistics, but year by year the work is getting in better shape, and additional workers are coming into the field.

The meeting began on Tuesday evening with a strong and appropriate sermon by J. C. McReynolds, of Daytona, who has been preaching there since September last. Wednesday was C. W. B. M. day, and Miss Rebel Withers, president of the state organization, presided in her own queenly way. Reports were made by the corresponding secretary, the treasurer, the superintendent of Juniors, and the evangelist, T. J. Longdon. Mrs. Call read an interesting paper on "Christ's Last Command." The report showed that there were eight or nine auxiliary societies in the state, and that they had contributed during the year for all purposes over $400. This work is growing in the state under the fostering care of Miss Withers, Brother and Sister Longdon and other officers, but it necessarily waits to some extent upon the growth of the churches, though one good society was reported, composed of "all the available women in the community," with a Congregationalist lady as president. The special feature of C. W. B. M. day was the addresses by Prof. Forest, of the University of Virginia, who gave two Bible studies on the book of Job during the day, and in the evening delivered his lecture on "India's Hurt," to a fine audience. Prof. Forest was highly appreciated by the convention, and his presence was an inspiration to the work in the state. Mrs. J. J. Haley, who has been spending several weeks in the state at Eustis, with her son, was another visitor to the convention from outside of the state, whose address on her experiences in Australia, with some lessons therefrom, was highly appreciated by all. The state officers who served last year were re-elected, including Miss Withers as president, Mrs. Longdon, corresponding secretary, Miss Liddon, treasurer, Mrs. F. M. Call, recording secretary. There was a brief consecration service, setting apart these women to their work conducted by the editor of this paper. A feature of the women's part of the convention was the presence of women from the Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches extending their sisterly greetings and reporting their missionary work. Bro. T. J. Longdon, who has been assisting the Christian women in the state in their work, made an encouraging report of progress. He has been, we believe, dividing his time between the C. W. B. M. and the State Board of Missions.

On Thursday the Florida State Missionary Society held its convention. In the absence of the president, R. T. Walker, caused by his mother's recent death, the vice president, J. T. Boone, of Jacksonville, presided. A message was read from the president outlining the work to be done, and a brief report of the operations of the past year and of the present condition of the churches was made by the corresponding secretary, C. W. Zaring, of Jacksonville. Two evangelists, T. J. Longdon and T. A. Cox, have been sustained part of the time during the past year with the assistance of the Home Board, and these have done a good work in strengthening the cause in the weak churches, preaching for those without preachers, and visiting and gathering together the scattered disciples in different places.

Besides the routine business of the convention, such as the appointment or committees and the hearing and disposition of their reports, there were addresses during the day on the following topics: On The Effect of Mission Work on the Workers, by Bro. T. A. Cox; Progress of the Work, by H. P. Longdon; on Foreign Missions, by the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST; on Florida for Christ, by B. F. Manire; and on The Kind of Men Needed for the Work in Florida, by J. P. Rowleson, pastor of the Tampa Church; on How to Succeed in our Work, by Professor Forest. There was an appeal for the state work by Z. W. Zaring, which resulted in the subscription of over one thousand dollars by those present for the work during the coming year. The Committee on Future Work recommended the continuance of the work at Daytona and keeping not less than two evangelists in the field, and three, if possible, and earnestly requested the continuance of the assistance from the Home Board. The amounts subscribed by the churches and individuals who were present or represented, indicate a large degree of liberality, when all the conditions are considered. The brethren in Florida are showing themselves worthy of the assistance of our Home Missionary Society in establishing our cause in that fair state.

There were about fifty delegates and visitors from outside the city, and these, with the local attendance, made a good audience, especially for the night services. Among the familiar faces whom we met there were the old veterans, Bro. Alfred Flower, of New York, Bro. B. F. Manire, of Mississippi and Florida, Dr. S. R. Woods and wife, of Bowling Green, Fla., and Brother Mann, of Mannville. These, with Bro. F. M. Call and wife, from Daytona and St. Louis, who are taking a deep interest in the work in Florida, and Brothers McReynolds, of Daytona, Boone, of Jacksonville, Rowlison, of Tampa, Professor Ricketts and family, formerly of Canton, Mo., Cyrus Jones, of Bowling Green, Fla., and D. E. Bast, formerly of Missouri, but now a member of the Tampa church, gave the convention a home-like appearance.

The great need of the cause in Florida, as was frequently brought out, is a larger number of efficient workers. Florida, it is said, cannot be converted by tourist preachers, who go down to spend two or three months of the year for their health. The problem is how to get a sufficient number of preachers to make the state their home, and to remain there all the year round. It has been demonstrated that this is not an impossible or difficult thing for people even from the north. The main difficulty, as we see it, is securing sufficient financial support. If preachers desiring a mild climate and having a little means to invest in a grove, would be willing to earn part of their living in that way until the churches are planted, the problem might be solved. But not only are preachers needed, but brethren and sisters for the rank and file. These, it is believed, would come to Florida in large numbers if they knew the advantages which the state offers in the way of delightful climate and opportunities for making a livelihood.

The closing session of the convention on Thursday evening was occupied with an address by the editor of this paper on The Religious Outlook, dealing especially with the condition and prospect of our own movement. There was a good attendance, not of our brethren alone, but from people of the city, and it is thought by brethren there that the convention had a fine local effect, both upon the church and the community. It was with no little feeling and earnestness that the audience sung, as its closing hymn, "God Be With You Till We Meet Again." The parting benediction was by our beloved Brother Flower. There can be no question of the future growth, in population and wealth, of the state of Florida. Nor should there be any doubt as to the growth of our cause in that state.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The last contribution to this department was mailed immediately on our arrival in Jacksonville, on our way from Cocoanut Grove to Tampa. We spent a day and night there, enjoying a delightful visit from Bros. J. T. Boone and James Small, pastor and evangelist, who are now engaged in a successful meeting in that city. We attended the meeting on Wednesday evening. The singing, led by Mrs. Sullivan, was very inspiring. There was a fine audience. Brother Small's theme for the evening was, "The Old Love Story"—a simple, tender and effective sermon on the old text, "God So Loved the World." No man, he said, could be saved until convinced that God loves him. Hence the discourse was aimed at that single point. There had been more than twenty-five added up to that time, and both pastor and evangelist were hopeful of a great meeting. It was a great delight to see so large and interested audience listening to the primitive gospel, in that Gate City to Florida. It was a demonstration of the wisdom of the investment we have made there and a convincing argument why we should complete what we have helped to bring to its present stage—their elegant house of worship. Several visitors from the north were enjoying the meeting, among whom was W. S. Dickinson, of Cincinnati. We may look in at the meeting again as we return home. These lines are written at Tampa, the metropolis of the western coast of Florida, where we arrived on Thursday evening. We were met at the station by Brother and Sister Rowlison, pastor and wife, and conducted to a comfortable boarding house down near the bay, where we are making our home for a few days.

When Brother Rowlison invited us to spend a few days in this city prior to the convention, and including Lord's day, he added in a postscript, with that "guile" which even Paul used to catch men, that "the fishing was just as good in Tampa Bay as in Black Lake at Macatawa Park." That settled it. We came. But being from Missouri we had to be shown, and last Saturday was selected for the day. Captain Warren and his sailing vessel, "Maud," had been engaged to take a party of friends out on the bay for a day's fishing. Captain Warren is a Yankee sailor who has been living in Florida since 1869. Besides Brother and Sister Rowlison, and the Editor and his wife, was Sister Larimore, daughter-in-law of the well-known evangelist, T. B. Larimore, who, with her husband, are members of the Tampa Church. It was a day's sport to be remembered. The conditions were right, the company was congenial, the lunch was abundant, and the box of fish caught was sufficient to satisfy the ambition of any true disciple of Izaak Walton. Each one seemed to be proud of his or her particular achievement. Brother R. and Sister L. were well pleased in leading in the largest number of sea trout; Mrs. R. was the heroine in capturing a very large gar along with her other captures; Mrs. G. drew out a sea robin—half bird and half fish—which added to the attractiveness of her string, while the Editor was quite content with having caught the largest trout, the greatest variety, and the only Spanish mackerel that was taken by the party. As to the captain, he furnished the bait, baited the hooks, took off the fish and gave general directions. The water in Tampa Bay is darker than in Biscayne Bay, and for that reason, perhaps, may afford better still fishing. At any rate, we came, we saw, and were conquered. Bro. R. made good his word, and we take that as a pledge that he is going to succeed in building up a good church in Tampa.

We spent last Lord's day with the church here, preaching for Bro. Rowlison in the morning and listening to an excellent discourse by him in the evening. There was a good audience both morning and evening, and six additions during the day, four by statement, having been members elsewhere, and two by confession of Christ and baptism—the sons of Brother Montgomery, one of the elders. Bro. J. P. Rowlison came here from Macon, Ga., three months ago, and already he has gotten the work well in hand, and with the energetic labors of himself and wife the church is having constant additions. A new spirit of hopefulness seems to pervade the members. They are meeting at present in a rude sort of tabernacle, without form or comeliness, but not uncomfortable for this climate. A new church building will, of course, be one of the necessities of the future. Brother Rowlison is supported here by our Home Board, and has agreed to remain with the work for five years. In that time, under his leadership, great progress will be made in firmly establishing our cause in this beautiful and growing city. We were surprised at the rapid strides it has made since our last visit, a few years ago. It must be reckoned among the most beautiful of the fair cities of the south. We have been delighted, since coming here, at the brightening outlook for the young church. Besides other friends we have met here is our venerable brother, Alfred Flower, now in his 85th year, but alert, full of

The Sixth Congress of the Disciples of Christ

St. Louis, Indianapolis, Lexington, Cleveland and Des Moines have enjoyed in succession the honor of entertaining the Congress of Disciples, and we have come to feel how indispensable these gatherings are for the discussion of those problems which, though themselves theoretical, underlie and implicate the most practical phases of our religious activity. At the congress which was held last week at Chicago the discussion covered ground which would have been good for at least six months of acrimonious newspaper controversy. Yet there was entire good feeling, though with frank differences of opinion and the utmost freedom of statement.

W. F. Richardson presided over the congress, and at its opening session responded to the address of welcome which was delivered by Prof. Shailer Matthews, who spoke for the University in the absence of President Harper.

The subject to which the most attention was directed, and with the various phases of which not less than four of the addresses were directly concerned, was Christian Union. The first address was on the question:

How Far is Primitive Christianity an Authoritative Precedent?

by I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky. According to the speaker, there are three possible answers to this question: the literalistic, the rationalistic and the scriptural. The literalistic would claim that the New Testament presents a complete plan of the church with respect to organization, worship, doctrine, methods of evangelization and all the details which enter into the life of the church in any age. It makes little of New Testament principles and busies itself with hunting a specific precept or example for every act. Its favorite text is, "See that thou make all things according to the pattern showed thee in the mount." The rationalistic contention is that the New Testament contains nothing authoritative except a few general principles; that a certain spirit and temper is to be gathered from the teaching of Jesus, but that all plans, methods and forms are to be determined by experience and utility. The comparative formlessness of the early Jerusalem church is cited as proof that no fixed form of organization or worship is definitely appointed. The scriptural view is that Jesus laid down some fundamental principles, and that there are given, for the purpose of illustration, certain precepts and a concrete picture of the church in action through a generation.

The principle of variation which was established by the apostles in their own dealings with various churches under various circumstances is itself a precedent to be followed. There is not a rigid pattern to be copied in detail under all circumstances. Local, temporal, personal, national and other adaptations were made by the apostles and must be made by us. This does not remove all authority. For example, baptism and the Lord's Supper were not varied under varying conditions, but were treated as essential, while other practices, such as the kiss of peace and the washing of the saints' feet, were treated as incidental. In such practices as the silence of women in the churches, the details are incidental, while the principle (modesty and conformity to local ideas of propriety) is permanent.

The motto, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak; where the Bible is silent, we are silent," as originally used, was both scriptural and effective, but the latter part of it has been grossly perverted by some who understand it as a demand for a "thus saith the Lord" for every detail. The silence of the Scripture is not against Scripture. We must be willing to make adjustments of methods and details while conforming to the New Testament principles. In the hemisphere of Christ's silence we will give liberty to others and claim it for ourselves, and will use our liberty in love. Humility, love, loyalty and liberty are the abiding essentials of the Christian edifice. Primitive Christianity is forever an authoritative precedent in so far as it is rooted in the principles of Jesus and controlled by His spirit. Brother Spencer's address was, on the whole, one of the most satisfactory of the entire congress. The most conservative men pronounced it sound, and the most progressive called it sane and sensible.

J. M. Lowe presented a brilliant paper on the same subject. Authority is always personal, he said. A book or a precedent can have authority only as it gets it from a person. An authoritative precedent is one which, by being followed, serves in the highest way the cause which called it into being. The test of authority is therefore to be found in practice. The writer distinguished between primitive Christianity and the primitive church. Christianity, which should be defined as loving and following Christ, is a matter of inspiration and spirit. The church is a necessary but incidental embodiment of that spirit. We have been trying to restore the primitive church rather than primitive Christianity. Primitive Christianity is not the way primitive disciples ought to have lived, but the way they did live. The application of the spirit of Christ to various local conditions created forms and methods which are not permanently authoritative. As to the definite test of loyalty and faith, where the church was evidently acting under guidance of the spirit of Christ, primitive Christianity is an authoritative precedent. The all-embracing precedent is the spirit of Jesus.

The general discussion on this subject was participated in by O. G. Herzog, who pointed out that while Christianity was the most tolerant religion on incidental matters, it is the most intolerant on points affecting its life, and by Bros. J. N. Crutcher, White, O. T. Morgan, John S. Sweeney and Z. T. Sweeney. Bro. John Sweeney was greeted with enthusiasm, and his comments were much enjoyed.

S. M. Cooper, of Cincinnati, presented a paper on:

The Relation of the Church to Social Reform Movements.

The brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God, he said, are correlative. The church has a practical purpose—the betterment of men. It must then have certain relations to other organizations which exist for the betterment of society. The church must see to it not only that men are fit to live in the world, but that the world is a fit place for men to live in. The church must consider not only cases but causes.

But while the improvement of environment is important, and while the church may do many things in this direction, the church as such cannot undertake to direct the policy of social reform movements and organizations. Socialism, prohibition, single tax, free trade and woman suffrage may all be good things. Many Christian people believe that the introduction of these would hasten the millennium, but for the church to formally espouse these causes would be to divide the church without advancing these interests.

Jesus laid down principles, but neither approved nor denounced existing social and political policies, though these included slavery and tyrannical government. He refused to judge between the two quarreling brothers who submitted their case to his arbitration, but he said "beware of covetousness." The gospel of Jesus does not include the details of any social or political scheme. Yet if the church proclaims the whole gospel, the citizens of the kingdom of God will be found on the right side of every fight for social betterment. Every social movement is essentially a religious movement. The relation of the individual Christian to social movements is more intimate than that of the church. It is the office of the church to make men. It is the duty of the men so made to do the social work which needs to be done. The speaker presented a large and liberal view of the Christian man's duty to forward all movements for social reform, political purity and the enforcement of law, but held that the church itself should in the main avoid entangling alliances with political and social organizations.

F. G. Tyrrell, of St. Louis, as first reviewer of the above paper, made a strong presentation of the duty of the church not only to awaken the conscience of its members and give encouragement to social movements in a general way, but also to go into details when the occasion demands and to denounce specific evils specifically. In his own day Jesus said nothing against slavery and political evils, but if he were here now witnessing the reign of lawlessness and vice in cities, a majority of whose citizens profess to be his followers, he would speak boldly and definitely. The church must of course keep out of party politics, but the church as such can fight legalized and licensed immorality and political corruption on a non-partisan basis.

Bruce Brown, of Chicago, said that from present indications Protestantism in large cities is a diminishing force, because its only plan is to seek and save individuals. Industrial and political organizations in this age have found it necessary to handle men in masses, and Romanism is doing the same, but Protestantism has not learned the secret. Protestants are still using in the cities the individualistic method, which is effective only in the rural districts. Paul was "all things to all men if by all means he might save some." We, with our large sense of the work to be done and yet with our lack of adaptability, are some things to some men if by some means we may save all. The work can never be accomplished that way. The church must come into closer relations with the organizations which handle men in masses. The church as such needs not hesitate to form the closest possible relation with educational and benevolent organizations and social settlements, and with law enforcement leagues and temperance movements. It might even endorse the Prohibition party and certainly ought to co-operate with the Anti-Saloon League. In dealing with political movements, the church must guard against being duped into the support of unworthy projects. The church can well afford to open its doors, especially on week nights, to representatives of many reform schemes, socialistic and otherwise, with the understanding that this does not mean endorsement, but indicates only sympathy with the general purpose. Industrial reforms are the hardest to handle. The tendency of labor unions is away from the church. The church must get into closer touch with labor unions, must stop lecturing them on their mistakes and try to get their point of view. There should be cordial relations between the church and secret fraternal orders, and it will, in the speaker's opinion, be an advantage to the preacher to be a member of several. Large churches should encourage the organization of local lodges among their own members, and a lodge room might possibly be provided in the church.

The general discussion of the topic was participated in by W. F. Richardson, who asserted that it was better for the preacher to be a mouthpiece for righteousness than for the church to pass resolutions; C. C. Rowilson, who said that, since the state has become more Christian and has taken over many of the activities formerly committed to the church, the church as such needs not take action except in unusual cases, and can confine itself to preparing men for Christian service in the state; Oliver W. Stewart confirmed the statement of the first speaker, that the church should not dissipate her energies by going officially into every movement, but should prepare her members to serve effectively in these movements which appeal most strongly to them. It was gratifying to hear Mr. Stewart, who is himself chairman of the national committee of the Prohibition party, say that what we need most in reform movements is sanity—the sense of proportion which will allow us to be reformers without becoming cranks. Mr. Stewart himself is pre-eminently that sort of reformer.

The Tuesday evening address was delivered by Prof. George B. Foster of the University of Chicago on

The Need of a New Apologetic.

At this session, without question, the interest reached high-water mark. Prof. Foster spoke for nearly two hours and, after a general discussion in which it seemed that every member of the Congress was eager to participate, the speaker occupied forty minutes more in answering some of the forty or fifty written questions which had been handed to him. Prof. Foster stated the task of apologetics as twofold: first, to determine what are the inalienable constituents of religion in general and of the Christian religion in particular; and second, to determine whether religion, and specifically the Christian religion, has a function in the culture and nurture of the spiritual life of men. It is one thing to test the validity of a system of thought; it is another thing to test the worth of a spiritual experience. The old apologetics approached the former problem; the new apologetics, the latter. The old point of view was concerned only with the question, Is this proposition or doctrine true? From the new point of view it is asked, Will religion "function serviceably?" Truth is not the highest attribute that can be predicated of religion. We do not ask of the eye and ear whether they are true, but whether they are useful in human experience. So of religion. As in science and art, so in religion, we seek not truth for the sake of truth, but truth for the sake of the worth of truth.

Modern apologetics begins with

Kant, Lessing and Rousseau who taught us the distinction between the knowledge problem and the worth problem. The knowledge problem, as applied to a rainbow, for example, has to do with the scientific description and explanation of the phenomenon; the worth problem is concerned with the appreciation of it as beautiful. The appreciation of its beauty does not wait upon the understanding of its origin and cannot be vitiated by any erroneous theory as to its cause. A notable failure to apply this distinction is seen in the recent "Babel und Bibel" controversy, in which it was assumed that the worth of certain conceptions was destroyed if it were shown that they originated in Babylon instead of among the Hebrews. An even more important application of the principle is to be made in regard to the personality of Jesus. Here, as elsewhere, the problem of worth does not depend upon a correct solution of the knowledge problem. His value to us, religiously, is not conditioned upon a correct definition of his person or an understanding of his origin. The need of a new apologetic arises from the fact that, with the modern world-view, which science is presenting, it has become increasingly difficult to bring educated men to an acceptance of those theories as to the origin of the Bible and Jesus which have hitherto been considered orthodox. The possibility of the new apologetic lies in the following facts: that the value of religious concepts is not dependent upon the preservation of any particular theory of their origin; that modern scientific thought can reach only to matters of knowledge and explanation; and that the interests of religion demand only the conservation of religious values and not the perpetuation of any particular explanation of their origin.

This line of apologetics does not necessarily concede the truth of the new view of the world. It does not necessarily surrender any of the old beliefs, even on questions of definition and explanation. But it maintains that the defense of Christianity is not dependent upon the defense of these things. It asks no one to surrender his faith in miracles or in the supernatural origin of Jesus or in his bodily resurrection, but it says to the man who has already given up these on what he considers good scientific ground, that there is still no reason why he should reject the religion of Jesus as a source of strength and guidance to his spiritual life.

It will readily be conceived that a representative gathering of Disciples of Christ was not willing to concede, off-hand, that the virgin birth and bodily resurrection of Jesus, not to mention his miracles, are not "inalienable constituents" of Christian faith. In making good his point concerning the need of this new apologetic, Prof.

As Seen from the Dome

By F. D. Power

Easter is the season of hope. We look toward the rising rather than the setting sun. The word that comes to us is one of joy, of victory, "Christ is risen!" In view of any question of Christ's resurrection, and of the fearful persecutions of the early time which came upon the disciples in consequence of their faith in his resurrection, Paul declares: "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." If we have no other comfort but in Christ, and if he be still dead and not yet risen, we are more to be pitied than other men. We are sadly deceived. We have deceived ourselves and have been denied by others. We have mortified ourselves, and have been persecuted by our fellows on account of our faith and hope in One who is not, and who, therefore, can neither succor us here nor reward us hereafter. Because they had hope in Christ for another and higher life they could bear the infinite sorrow which their profession brought upon them.

Carved in stone in the Catacombs there are wonderful testimonies. The early infancy of Christianity is not a dim and shadowy cloudland in which nothing is seen but a few figures of martyrs moving uncertainly amid general darkness. The men and women that wandered in the deserts and mountains and dens and caves of the earth even in this had their mission. The monumental remains of their martyrdom take us back to the first ages of the church and exhibit before our eyes these primitive communities which the apostles founded and over which the apostles presided. As when treading the streets of Pompeii, we have the life of the old pagan world brought before us with a vividness which makes other representations dull and tame, so when we descend in the catacombs of Rome we seem to see the struggling, persecuted community which then in caves and dens of the earth wrought for itself a hidden home, and whence it came forth at last conquering and to conquer. Far dearer than the remnants of Greece or pagan Rome, of Egyptian, Assyrian, or Babylonian civilization, are these evidences of the belief and conduct of the early church.

There are many lessons from these tombs. First, the vast number of the followers of Christ in the primitive age is revealed. With nothing to tempt them, with everything to deter them from embracing the Christian faith, they yet turned by thousands to this way, and along these 900 miles of streets are said to be 7,000,000 of graves of the holy dead. Tacitus speaks of the Roman Christians as "ingenus multitudo," a huge or vast multitude. "We are of yesterday," says Tertullian, A.D., 200, "and yet we fill all your palaces, your cities, islands, castles, towns, courts, your very camps, your senate, your markets. We have left you only your temples. If so great a multitude as we should separate from you and retire to some distant quarter of the earth you would be discouraged at your solitude." Twenty-five years after the death of Christ Paul writes to the Romans: "Your faith is spoken of in the whole world," and Pliny, thirty years later, says: "The contagion of this superstition has spread not only to the cities, but about the villages and open country." Seven millions of dead in four hundred years would indicate an immense number of disciples in the face of contempt, hatred, and fiery trial. Best of all is the testimony as to the belief of the early Christians. A primitive gospel is disclosed here that harmonizes with the simple interpretation of the New Testament. Here the doctrine of the resurrection is plainly taught on every tombstone. The Christian is not dead. Dormit, "he sleeps." Quiescit, "he rests." Depositus est, "he is laid away." Always he is "in pace," in peace. One reads: "Alexander is not dead, but lives beyond the stars, and his body rests in this tomb." Another: "Here lies Paulina in the place of the blessed." Again: "Genella sleeps in peace," "Aselus rests in Christ." Survivors do not mourn despondingly. Trust, resignation, hope are symbolized. The anchor carved on the slab indicates the Christian's confidence. The phoenix and the peacock are speaking signs of the resurrection. The departed are not represented as dead. Christians never see death. The very word death is absent; Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light. Death is an enemy, but Christ hath conquered it, destroyed it, delivered them that were held in bondage through fear of it. Death is no longer conqueror, but servant and helper. Death belongs to the inventory of the Christian's treasures: "All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Peter, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come"—all things. "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain." And the soul "departs to be with Christ which is far better," travels out of the body that it may abide with the Lord. When God says, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," as he is the God of the living, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are alive unto God. So our Lord said, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise," "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit"; and Stephen cried, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!"

Why is it that we cannot understand this? Why speak of Christian men and women as dying with the thought that they are unhappy, or passed beyond the realms of consciousness, or no longer ours? Why regard this change as separating our loved ones so far, so far, and so long, so very long? "She is dead," they say, "dead! Leave her: it is only the clay." Gently they draw the lids over the dear eyes, smooth the tresses, close the lips over all their secrets, cross the hands, arrange the flowers about the face, and say: "Come now: God knows." But amid the silence and gloom and fragrant blossoms the heart questions the stately and beautiful dead for the secret of dying. Is it infinite wonder that we should lose life? Is it a greater marvel to feel the perfect calm after the closing struggle? Is it a miracle of sleep dreamless and profound beyond all thought? Is it a revelation clear and minute of all life's past history? Is it a startling, peaceful, joyless launch of the soul upon the glories of an eternal world? What is the strangest, suddenest, most marvelous thing of all the surprises on the threshold of immortality? What can you tell us?

What, after all, can it be but the overthrow of all our old ideas about death and the ineffable knowledge that, though dead, we have never died? That it is but a departure to be with Christ; that school is out and we go home; that the soul no sooner leaves its clay tabernacle than the joy of eternal assurance and the glory of the Redeemer's presence are known to us! "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth"—that is immediately, from the moment of death—"they do rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

Once more, the lesson of the resurrection comes to our busy, rushing, sorrowing world. Our Lord has written this promise not in books alone, says Martin Luther, but in every leaf of the springtime. "Because I live, ye shall live also," is the sweetest of all promises. "I am the resurrection and the life," is the most majestic of all utterances. "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body," is the best possible explanation of the mystery. Let faith and patience then do their perfect work, and hope bring its constant inspiration, and joy be full. Let the lilies breathe their heavenly incense, and the voice of sweetest song gladden the sanctuary, and the little children be suffered to enter the kingdom. Let the strongest words be spoken in the most beautiful and telling way concerning Jesus and the resurrection, and men be raised even now out of self, out of smallness, out of all wrong to walk in newness of life. Surrexit Christus hodie—"Christ is risen to-day!"

"O what a night was that which wrapt
The heathen world in gloom!
O what a sun which broke this day
Triumphant from the tomb!"

What Is Left?

By Judge A. E. Wilkinson

But failure is by no means proof of the falsity of the theory which has failed; nor does the fact that an institution has succeeded and become established necessarily make more than a prima facie case in its favor. It must still be able to make good by reasons, when challenged, its right to exist and command us; or must go down, as thousands of hoary delusions have done and will continue to do. Doubtless their success and acceptance by others is the true cause of our acceptance of the vast majority of the beliefs and loyalties which we profess. In general, as Mr. Balfour has so ingeniously shown us, they are causes without being reasons; but not necessarily so. Success may be, and in many cases is, the best possible logical reason for believing that anything deserves to succeed. How peculiarly this is true of the Christian religion and how conclusive is the inference to be drawn in its case is my present subject.

If an argument upon this line is to have any force, it will be necessary to base it upon the Gospel narratives as they would be viewed by an infidel, a Renan or Strauss, for instance. We shall proceed, then, on the assumption that we have in the Gospels a fairly accurate portrayal of the character, aims and teachings of Jesus, for this such infidels would concede. But the narratives of miracles, being debatable ground, we shall not assume to be either true or false.

We shall assume, then, that Jesus claimed to be possessed of more than human power, to speak with authority, and to discharge a mission which he believed to have been intrusted to him, with reference to the regeneration of the human race. For this purpose he proposed the establishment of an organized society on earth, referred to by him as the Kingdom of God or the Kingdom of Heaven. To the establishment of this society he gave the work of his life, and he crowned this work by meeting and even courting death for its sake.

One of the most striking features in the teaching of Jesus is the serene confidence which he expressed in the success of his mission. The society which he labored to establish was to be one of the things which should endure. Not only should it endure, but it should triumph. No disappointment, no present failure, ever dimmed for a moment his majestic assurance of ultimate victory for his cause. It was to take the world, and its triumph was to be upon the lines which he established and marked out for its success. If we consider the incongruity between the amazing things which he proposed to accomplish and the apparently hopeless methods by which he proposed to accomplish them, our wonder will constantly grow.

The men who have permanently affected the history of the world have, for the most part, been great organizers. A mighty political, social or moral organization may continue for ages to sway the lives of men after the impulse which created its machinery and set it in operation is withdrawn. The Roman empire in its decadence, the Church of Rome in its most corrupt periods, are familiar illustrations; and illustrations might be multiplied. It was by this power that the Macedonian conqueror left such deep marks on the history of the world, though his early death left the organization at which he aimed unfinished and dissolving.

But Jesus left, and apparently with intention, not the simplest framework of an organization behind him. The fasts and observances, all the paraphernalia of a church society, were not for his followers while the bridegroom was with them. He selected a small company of obscure and illiterate men to be taught and trained in his ideas and to give them to the world when he should be taken away from it. I have spoken of his Kingdom of God as an organization; but it can hardly, during the life of Jesus, deserve the name of an organization at all, however complicated may be the ecclesiastical machinery with which it surrounded itself in later ages. It was merely a group of believers, united only by faith, by which seems to have been meant personal loyalty to him. What slight ecclesiastical form the primitive church possessed it received from his followers after his death. While he lived there was but one bond of union among them, and that was that they should be his followers and accept him as their guide and leader.

Now, a personal leadership, in the hands of a great and masterful personality, may accomplish wonderful things while the leader himself remains the living and moving spirit. But it is the fatal defect of such leadership that the institution of which it is the head inevitably falls to pieces like a rope of sand when that influence is withdrawn. It was, however, solely this, the personal devotion of his followers to him as their captain and king, on which Jesus relied for the success of his cause. The most marvelous feature of his scheme is precisely here: that he counted on this personal devotion and loyalty continuing even after his death. It is clear, even, that he regarded his death, which, according to all human probability ought to have utterly crushed and ruined his society, as a necessary part of his plans for its success. He was still to be their Lord and sovereign. They were to follow him with a still more loyal devotion when the influence of his personal presence was withdrawn. That withdrawal was necessary in order that the "Comforter," the more efficient form of personal divine leadership, might come to them. Nay, more, he was to be with them always, even to the end. A sense of his personal presence, of communion with him, was to be felt in his church through all time, and inspire them as his bodily presence had never done.

'Tis a strange foundation, this simple faith, for a kingdom which was designed to exact an obedience and service such as could not be commanded by Tiberius with his legions. Trust in one no longer with them to answer to their trust. Belief in one who had disappointed all their most cherished expectations. Loyalty to a chief no longer living to lead them. Obedience to one who could no longer command obedience. Devotion to the dead captain such as they had never yielded to him while living. When the faith of the Thomas who had seen him was so weak and wavering, how foresee the triumph of those who had seen not and yet were to believe.

The result has answered his expectations. His death effected a personal devotion of his followers more powerful and persuasive than was known in his lifetime. It is true that naturalism regards the conviction of the Christian world on this subject as a delusion. Millions of men and women, during nineteen hundred years of the world's history, have testified to the sense of Christ's presence in their hearts. Millions, through ages of time, have found this sense of personal dependence upon Christ, of the comfort, inspiration and power of his personal leadership, felt as a presence in the inmost soul, the mainspring of the conduct of life. This testimony the unbeliever must sweep away as a fantasy and a delusion. Grant him the right to do so and he has only rendered the miracle of Christ's kingdom more astounding still. For it was upon this very thing that the Savior relied. That personally he should be more to them, dearer to them, more commanding in his influence over their thoughts and lives, when removed from their presence, was the paradox upon which he built the hopes of his kingdom. It is a delusion, you tell us. The greater the miracle that one could have foreseen and foretold a delusion so extraordinary, should have counted on it and given up his life on the conviction that it would follow upon the sacrifice.

As if to emphasize the fact that the methods by which success was to be made humanly possible were deliberately rejected, Jesus announced views apparently most impracticable and visionary as to the relation of his followers to the civil and military power which he must have believed they might one day be able to control if they so desired. To its support he promised everything which could be given without surrender of principle, and from it he asked nothing in return.

An Easter Love Affair

By Olive A. Smith

On the morning of April 13, at 10:25 by the clock in the Bethany tower, Clark Bennington succumbed to a violent attack of love at first sight. He had always been a pronounced unbeliever in the doctrine, and the unbelief had gradually expanded into a positive disbelief of love in general. He had proved, to his own satisfaction, that it was only another form of the universal selfishness which rules the world. He meant to write a book about it. In fact he was almost ready to begin the series of scientifically philosophical treatises, which would naturally grow into a volume, when he found himself stretched on a white cot, in a white ward of Bethany Hospital, burning with fever, and raging at Fate for playing him so contemptible a trick.

The entire force of nurses and physicians agreed that they had never known a patient who seemed to take such delight in making life miserable for them as did this young newspaper man. Sister Letitia was his first nurse. She was young, gentle, and sensitive, but she was also brave and patient. She stuck to her post for three hours after Bennington's arrival. At the end of that time she appeared weeping at the ward superintendent's door, declaring that she could not return to the ward as the new patient's nurse. "Such sarcasm! Such—such hatefulness! He wanted to know if this was a charity hospital; said we needn't try to work any charity game on him; that people do what they call charity just to buy their own self-satisfaction. He wouldn't take his medicine at first. He told the doctor that the fever was one kind of poison, and his nasty drug was another kind. Just as well fight it out with the first one, and avoid complications. And the doctor laughed! I was so provoked, but he told me afterwards that he couldn't help it; such astuteness always upset his gravity."

The superintendent smiled.

"Well, nurse," she said, quietly, "you need a rest any way. I will send Sister Honora. You know she is reserved for such emergency cases, on account of her peculiar power and her long experience."

That night Bennington lost himself in delirium, and the welfare of the other patients demanded his removal to a room of his own. Thus the gray-haired nurse was allowed to concentrate her unusual powers upon the soothing and control of a single patient, and she soon had the reporter well in hand. He talked incessantly of his work at the Herald office, of his experiences when he came to the city, of his humiliating struggles as the "cub," and of the clever piece of strategy which had won him distinction and promotion—the interviewing of a politician who had been pronounced impossible by every other reporter in the city.

Judging by his ravings the nurse decided that she had never known a patient so steeped in an inordinate personal ambition. To conquer, to subdue, to rule and govern; to demonstrate his ability to succeed—this was the burden of his talk; and mingled with it was a bitterness, a stinging cynicism, which was a startling revelation even to the woman who had spent thirty years among the prostrate victims of life's battles.

When the fever passed, bringing the return of consciousness, the patient had so far submitted to Sister Honora's control that she kept him from continual railing at the loss of time and expense of his sickness. April had come, and even the thick hospital walls could not shut out the many sweet voices and delicious odors which filled the resurrected earth.

During those days of convalescence the square-shouldered young giant would lie gazing dreamily out of the window, fretting occasionally at the "confounded luck" that had interrupted his work, and promising Sister Honora that he would "make things hum" when he did get out.

"Tell me, Mr. Bennington," said the nurse one day, "about your relatives. I wanted so much to write, but I had no address, and I could not find out where they are. You have parents living, or brothers and sisters, have you not?"

"Parents, no; they are both dead," replied Bennington. "I can't remember my mother at all. My father died three years ago; the second year after I kicked out of drudging away on an old hill farm, and started to college. I have some brothers, but don't write to them. I don't care about it. They always made sport of me because I was big and awkward, and as much of a born failure as they were born successes. I wasted my best years in being religious and conforming to sentimental notions of duty. Other people got the benefit of my folly, and preached to me about being guided by Providence. It was providential all right for them. But I'm out of it now. No doubt I'm a heathen, but I don't care to see any of them or to go home."

Sister Honora had grown very sagacious in her management of her patient. She had also grown very fond of him. She smiled at his rude speeches, and when he seemed inclined to talk too long or too emphatically on any subject, she would slip quietly out of the room. When she returned he was usually serene and reasonable.

"Do you know, nurse," he said one day, "you are positively the only woman I ever got acquainted with. I know just as much about women and children as a bug knows about philosophy. And you needn't tell me that I'll ever know any more, either. I don't want to. I've spent my share of time on illusions and delusions. I don't want the task of dispelling any more of them."

Bennington ran his hands through his shock of reddish brown hair, challenging the nurse with his big, blue eyes, which were beginning to shrink into their proper proportions, as a single feature of his broad face. But Sister Honora did not accept the challenge. She held her peace.

The week before Easter was visitors' week at Bethany, and one morning Sister Honora entered Bennington's room followed by a stately gentleman wearing clerical attire and a clerical countenance. Bennington was reading the morning Herald, and appreciating the kind things which the editorial page contained regarding his own illness and the prospect of a speedy return to work. The nurse looked keenly at him as she introduced the Reverend Doctor Allworthy. The clergyman saw only a big, muscular fellow with a freckled face and an intellectual forehead, who looked at him through guileless blue eyes and smiled as he shook hands. If Sister Honora saw more she made no sign, and having cherished a little unaccountable dislike for Dr. Allworthy, she immediately left the room, determined to allow matters to take their course.

Twenty minutes later she returned, and feminine curiosity bade her linger at the door, which was slightly ajar. It was Bennington's voice which reached her ear; bold, clear and incisive, ringing with the tones she had not heard for many weeks. "You say that pain and sorrow and poverty are the instruments for the development of Godly character. You think it ought to make a man better to suffer. It doesn't. It makes him worse. Hardship isn't a blessing. It's a curse. I know all about your notions of Divine guidance and Providence. I've lived under them. The man who goes out to kill his fellows in battle gets his commission from the Lord. Murderers are nearly always told to kill their victims. Our prayers are selfish desires, our wills push the desires into realization and we say that God answers our prayers."

Sister Honora was far too mindful of her patient's welfare to hesitate longer. He was too weak to endure the excitement which was manifested in his voice. So she bustled into the room with an air of authority, proposing a visit to the other three occupants of her ward. She disregarded the ruffled serenity of both men, and an hour later returned to her charge. Bennington was asleep.

The next caller was a Christian

Scientist. The reporter thought him the handsomest man he had ever seen. In form and feature, manner and speech, he was a model of symmetry and personal culture. The nurse was amused at the expression of admiring envy in Bennington's eyes as they followed the man's every movement and gesture. But when the scientist said: "My young friend, I take my stand in Universal Consciousness and calmly ignore the existence of the subjective entities of the mortal mind. I have attained to a realization of the All-Good, and in that realization there is no such thing as fear—"

Bennington's long arm was thrust out quickly, as if by accident, while he balanced himself and sat upright in bed. Then he smiled as he placed his hand on the seat of the empty chair. The scientist, who had occupied it, was standing on the opposite side of the room. "Did I startle you, my dear sir?" he said softly. "Pardon me. I was born as graceful as a rhinoceros, and I've never improved. Pray go on with your—your statement of creed. I am interested." But Sister Honora did not seem interested in helping the scientist find the thread of his discourse, and the visit was terminated with some abruptness.

A curative hypnotist, a practitioner of suggestive therapeutics, an osteopath, and a German metaphysician who sat in a New York office and sent out healing vibrations at ten cents per vibration, were the visitors for the remainder of the week. Then came Easter Sunday, the last of the reception days, when the beloved with her mother came to bring light and joy to many stricken ones in Bethany; the day when Clark Bennington fell hopelessly in love, when he knew it, but was powerless to resist the sweet intoxication.

She brought him a great bunch of violets. She placed them in his hand, saying timidly that she hoped he would like them. Her beauty, her grace and sweetness, mingled with her frank admiration of himself, filled his soul with a delicious joy. He tried to thank her, but he could not say what he wanted to say. He lifted the dewy mass of fragrance to his face and closed his eyes, for he feared that his beloved would see his tears. After she had gone he talked of her, and Sister Honora was very sympathetic. It was a beautiful Easter day, and the joyful climax was reached when the nurse informed him that Edith—that was her name—was to come often. She, herself, had made the necessary arrangements. And Bennington thanked her, his voice trembling with emotion which the sagacious nurse pretended not to observe.

During the next three weeks the beloved paid many visits to Bethany, and Bennington's anxiety to get back to work seemed to have suffered a decline. He hung upon her every word and look. As soon as she was gone he would count the days until time for another visit. Then it dawned upon him quite suddenly one day that it was time for him to leave Bethany. He was no longer an invalid. And that very day something else happened. Sister Honora broke the news to him as gently as she could. His beloved was very ill. She was at home and she had asked for him!

In a few moments he was outside the hospital walks. He looked anxiously down the incline where the steel threads of the car line wavered and glistened before his weak vision. He felt bewildered by the sense of in-

The Birthday of Hope.

By J. John Duncan-Clark.

The souls of men at the end of days,
All shiv'ring stood by a sullen stream,
And they sought in vain with an anxious gaze,
From the further shore a gleam.
The black, cold waters swiftly ran,
And the damp, dark mist wrapt all in gloom;
The hand of Fate pressed each soul of man
To ford the flood of doom.
But the grip of Fear held each soul back,
And above the angry river's roar
There arose the cry, "O Fate, alack!
But we see no further shore!
It is dark—so dark; there is none to guide;
We know not what beyond us lies,
The black stream flows with a strong, swift tide;
He who seeks to ford it dies!"

On a sudden shone a soft, clear light,
A figure stood 'mid the souls of men,
His face and form a wond'rous sight;
They worshipped there and then.
His head was crowned with a wreath of thorn,
His hands and feet bore crimson stain,
The flesh of His side was rent and torn,
His face was white with pain.
Through the shiv'ring ranks He passed, until
His bleeding feet just touched the brink,
They watched Him enter the waters chill—
With a gasp they watched Him sink!
The darkness fled from the soft, clear light
That stronger grew, and more, and more,
Until at last in the radiance bright
They saw the further shore.
And there He stood who had stemmed the tide,
And beckoned all with His wounded hand;
They looked, and lo! through the waters wide
A pathway of dry land!
A gladsome troupe they followed then,
With triumph song and shouts of praise,
For Him who had freed the souls of men finite brightness and fragrance and space. It was a relief to get inside the car. He said to himself that his mind must be as weak as his body, for he could think of but one thing, "She loves me. She asked for me. It isn't a matter of business or a matter of policy. She hasn't the shadow of an object in it. How strange! How wonderful!"
From death at the end of days!

Three weeks later the reporter made his twenty-third call at the home of his beloved. A servant ushered him into the library. There he waited nearly half an hour, his big body sunk dejectedly into a chair, his face buried in his hands. When he heard the rustle of a woman's skirts he dreaded to look up. He knew there was a verdict. Edith's mother had come to know him very well, and she only touched his shoulder saying, "She will live. She asked for you an hour ago, and the doctor told me to send you up."

When Bennington felt the soft arms about his neck and heard the voice of his beloved assuring him of her devotion, he was saying to himself: "What a mystery! What a tragedy, that men and women can't preserve even one of the qualities that constitute such a being! And yet I believe Sister Honora is a little like her; Sister Letitia, too. What a beast I was!"

"Do you know," his beloved was saying, "Do you know its my birthday? I'm six to-day. I'll be a woman pretty soon. Won't that be nice?"

"O," said Bennington. It was an exclamation of pain. Then a glow of hope transfigured his rugged features. "Yes, Edith," he said gently, "It will be nice."

Union, Co-Operation, Federation, or What?

Upon a recent Lord's day I was at Urbana, Mo. There are two organizations there: Christian and Methodist Episcopal. It was not our regular day for preaching. It was the Methodists'. It was also their day for a missionary offering. The Methodist minister hunted me up, said he considered it a Godsend that a man of the missionary spirit had struck the town at that time and that he wished me to preach the sermon and take up the collection. I consented, provided he would preach at night and take up an offering for the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, which he readily agreed to do. After my sermon in the morning he insisted that I preach at night, being, as he termed it, a "missionary specialist"; and a new voice in the community, he thought, could do more good than he could under the circumstances. I therefore preached at night and took up the offerings, which were both liberal and larger than those of last year. Remarks are now in order!

News From Many Fields

Kansas.

"The winter is over and gone, and the time of the singing of the birds has come."

"While the earth remaineth seed time and harvest . . . shall not cease."

But it is always harvest time for the Christian, and always seeding time.

The Master's cause in the Sunflower State is going grandly on. The churches were never more earnest and aggressive in their efforts to firmly establish themselves in their respective localities, and hold aloft the banner of our King.

We dedicated at Iola, March 6, raising $2,425.00. E. N. Phillips is the beloved pastor. They have a nine thousand dollar property. R. A. Omer and L. D. Sprague were at the dedication, rendered valuable aid, and immediately began a protracted meeting.

We are under promise to dedicate at Dwight, April 3d, at Dresden, April 17th, and at Argentine some time in May. Many other church buildings are in course of erection in the state, such as Wichita, Emporia, Yates Center, Parsons, Clearwater, and Herington.

C. C. Atwood and wife are at Mound City in a meeting. Eleven added at last report. An epidemic of measles greatly hindered the meeting.

J. Ira Jones and Bert Bentley are at Armourdale, and had twenty-two additions by the 12th. This church passed through the great flood, and the membership is so scattered and demoralized that the work necessarily moves slowly, but the people are greatly pleased with the work of the evangelists.

C. A. Hill and wife were compelled to stop the meeting at Roscoe temporarily, on account of Brother Hill taking sick with pneumonia. They are efficient evangelists.

Brother Clutter has had a great meeting at Narka; 73 added. This is a good work. Brother Clutter thinks Kansas is a great state for young men. We fully agree with him.

The Kansas Ministerial Institute meets at Hutchinson, April 5-7. A strong program has been prepared for our edification. Every preacher in the state should attend this gathering of our ministry.

The Kansas brotherhood should note the following dates for the district conventions. First district at Leavenworth, June 6-9. Second district at Olathe, May 9-11. Third district at Chetopa, May 3-5. Fourth district at Peabody, May 11-13. Fifth district at Courtland, June 1-3. Sixth district at Osborne, June 21-23. Seventh district at Lyons, April 26-28. Eighth district at Dodge City, June 14-16. Ninth district at (to be selected), May 17-19. Each district should take pride in its convention. The preachers and all the workers should take a deep interest. Work for a large attendance and a helpful program.

Holding the Ropes.

When William Carey was considering [the proposition to go to India as missionary he said to his brethren, "I will go down, but you must hold the ropes." So he started on that wonderful mission with his faith in his God and in his brethren sustaining him. He had many and severe trials, but the "rope" was firmly held by those in the home land.

The Kansas churches should remember that their missionaries have gone forth relying upon their brethren to sustain them. Only those directly connected with the work realize the full weight of responsibility resting upon those who go forth in this mighty conflict with sin. The churches in their anxiety to better their local condition, meet other missionary calls and are apt to forget or neglect the state missionaries. We have written to a number of the churches asking them to raise their apportionments for state missions on the last Sunday in March or the first Sunday in April. Brethren, will you take hold of the ropes? We beg of you not to turn this matter lightly aside, saying that some other church will do its part and thus release you from immediate action. Our missionary year closes with the month of June. The time is short and we must act promptly and generously if we do what we should do and can do during the remainder of this year. Brethren, if you don't pull on the ropes, shake it any way, so that those of us who are far below will feel the vibrations and know that there is a friendly hand ready to come to our rescue.

Empire State Notes.

Bro. F. O. Fannon is in a meeting with Wm. D. Ryan at Syracuse.

Lewis S. Cost, of Harrisville, New York, has been called to the work at East Aurora. This is where the Havens Home of the Benevolent Association is located.

Just returned from New York City, where I delivered an address before the Disciples' Union of Greater New York. The churches there seem to be moving along well. The union met at the Lenox Avenue Church, where Bro. J. P. Lichtenberger is pastor. He has a vigorous church and a well equipped building.

Am now in a meeting with Bro. G. B. Townsend, of Troy. This is one of our best and most active churches. Brother Townsend is educating the people especially along steady missionary lines. Last year, with an average Bible-school attendance of 235, they had a children's day offering of $250. Can any church in the brotherhood beat that. Bro. C. H. Vanzandt is one of the most efficient Bible-school superintendents I have seen. It does one's heart good to hear the Sunday-school given in concert the steps in becoming a Christian, quoting the Scripture references as they give them. Such training will bear fruit.

Recently closed a meeting with C. C. Waite, of Upper Troy. We had fine interest and attendance right through, and we trust the community understands what we stand for. There were many attendants from other churches. Brother Waite has a strong hold on the community, and is doing an excellent work in this new mission field. There were about a dozen additions, but other families interested, who will come.

Troy is the home of the collar and cuff industry. One factory alone employs over 2,000 hands. One wonders who wears all the linen. This is a great manufacturing center. Strung along the Hudson river here within a radius of ten miles, are Albany, Troy, Watervliet, Lansingburg, Cohoes and Waterford. A combined population of about 250,000. Cohoes is the great cotton mill center, and Watervliet contains the United States Arsenal, where they make the big guns.

Eight miles east of Troy is the village of Poestenkill, where Jas. A. Garfield preached and held his writing school and debate while attending Williams College at Williamstown, Mass.

New England.

Bro. J. H. Hardin has resigned his position of New England evangelist, his resignation to take effect March 21. He took this action because of the continued illness of his wife. The work necessitates absence from home a great part of the time, and having no one to stay with his wife, he concluded it was best to give up the work. We are sorry to lose Brother Hardin, for he is a fine Christian man, a strong preacher and able executor. We expected that he would act as superintendent of New England missions this year, and with the knowledge he has gained of the field as evangelist, we felt confident he would lead us into greater, better and larger work. It will interest the brethren to read a brief summary of his year's labor with us. In his last report before the Board of the New England Christian Missionary Society, he said: "As this report closes a year's work, I submit a summary of the main features for the year. Places visited—several of them more than once—19; meetings held, 13; sermons preached, 245; additions—including certain scattered disciples brought into active relationship—87; church planted, one; set more fully in order, two; traveling expenses, $114.77; cash raised in the field, $526.10." In addition to this, he did a great deal of work which cannot be tabulated. During the month of April and part of May, Brother Hardin will be in Kentucky, canvassing the churches in the interest of the May offering for home missions.

Bro. Wm. Pearn has resigned as pastor of the churches in South Lubec and East Machias, Me., resignation to take effect May 31. He finds the climate too severe for his health.

Brother Harry Mimmick, the pastor at Lubec, Me., has so far recovered from his illness that he is able to preach once every Lord's day.

The Danbury, Conn., church has had 70 additions since Jan. 1: 43 of these came as the result of a meeting held by W. J. Wright, of Washington, D. C.

Highland Street Church, Worcester, Mass., has had a net increase in the past twelve months of 58. The church is less than two years old. Present membership, 130.

Bro. Roland A. Nichols is in a two weeks' meeting at Manton, R. I. Prospects excellent.

A weekly, named "The Christian Courier," edited by the scholarly Dr. J. Van Horn, is being published in the interests of the First Church at Worcester, Mass. It gives the news of the local work and is full of good thought. It is bound to be of benefit to the cause. The First Church is one of the best in New England. Its membership is active, abounding in every good work.

Bro. H. L. Calhoun, of Cambridge, Mass., has been engaged to supply the pulpit of the Boston church for the next few months.

G. A. REINL, Cor. Sec. of N. E.

Ohio's Capital.

The thing of chiefest interest to the Disciples of Christ in this city during the past few weeks was the organization, in a temporary way, Lord's day, March 20, of the fifth congregation in the suburb of Linden Heights, to the northeast of the city. For several years a Bible-school has been maintained there, and the pastors of the churches have been taking turn about in preaching on Lord's day afternoon at three o'clock. Bro. Wesley Hatcher, who has done much for the mission, was master of ceremonies, and the other ministers assisted him. Bro. S. H. Bartlett, our efficient state secretary, was present and preached a most suitable sermon for the occasion on "Four Requisites of a Successful Church." At the close of the sermon about thirty people signed the roll as charter members. The new congregation starts off with every promise of soon becoming a lusty youngster, and we hope to have a young man located there as pastor by the first of July. A lot has already been donated, and a new church building will likely be erected before next winter.

Bro. S. H. Forrer, of West Fourth Avenue Church, began a protracted meeting Lord's day. He is taking vigorous hold of the work in that part of the city, and the brethren are to begin the erection of a new church house at once. It will be the auditorium of which the present building will be a part, furnishing seatings for about seven hundred. The Bible-school connected with this church is the largest we have in the city.

Bro. Wesley Hatcher recently closed a very fine meeting with his congregation, the Chicago Avenue, resulting in about forty additions, and should have gone on several weeks, but was broken into by the scourge of typhoid fever that has been in our city. Brother Hatcher is now the oldest pastor, in time of service, among our preachers in Columbus, and is doing a remarkable work. His church will become self-supporting after July next.

Bro. J. H. Dodd, of Franklin Avenue Church, held a meeting there, doing the preaching and singing himself, and has been enabled to reach a large number of new families. This church will also soon begin the erection of a large auditorium, covering all of their lot. The work is flourishing in every way.

Here at the Central we have closed the first six months of our labors. In that time just ninety persons have been received into the fellowship of the church, about half of whom were baptized. The church has in the same length of time raised a little more than $400 for our various missionary enterprises, indeed, averaging nearly $100 per month for missions. It is a good record for the "mother" church. In addition to this, a little more than $500 has been paid on debts, the pastor's salary and other current expenses paid in full every week, and large audiences at all the services have been in evidence, and a spirit of unity and enthusiastic work has permeated all the church. The Bible-school reached an attendance last Lord's day of 153, the largest number present, excepting at rallies, for a long time past. Our C. E. is one of the very best I have ever known, and the auxiliaries to the C. W. B. M. and Ladies' Aid Society are large and flourishing. The Central is one of the best churches I have ever served. There are so many devoted, pious men and women in it, who think and plan and work and pray for the success of the kingdom of Christ at home and abroad. With such a state of affairs, it cannot help growing and accomplishing more and more for the Master as the years come and go.

All of us are so sorely missing the beloved, J. E. Strickler, our senior elder, who has so recently entered upon his eternal reward. He loved the Church of God and served it faithfully in every way. May the Lord raise us up many like him!

During the month of February I assisted in a meeting at Springfield. There were 33 additions, of whom 23 made the good confession. Brother and Sister Harp have wrought wonders in the Springfield church. They are on their fifth year of service.

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

I am just sending out the following letter: Dear Brethren of the Churches of Christ in Maryland and District of Columbia:

We rejoice in the good reports of the offering for foreign missions, and now our hearts turn to our own "home land." We must renew and redouble our diligence for the first Lord's day in May for the battle royal for Home missions.

To help prepare the way for this day and offering Bro. Z. T. Sweeney, president of the American Christian Missionary Society, will make a tour in the east and will speak at Washington, D. C., Tuesday, April 5. To those who have heard his eloquent discourses we need not tell what an uplift this will be for this great cause. For those who have not heard him this will be a splendid opportunity to hear this powerful speaker on this great theme, and get enthused for home missions. Stir up your whole church, and come with a large delegation. The place and hour will be announced later.

Yours for our best offering for home missions,
J. A. HOPKINS, Cor. Sec.

I send this to your valuable paper, hoping it may enthruse others to see that we who are on home missionary ground are getting ready to give for the great work of the A. C. M. S. Missionary ground, did I say? Yes, when we have in Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia but 5,000 Disciples, New England less than 3,000, the great state of New York about 10,000, and but 6,000 in our Eastern Pennsylvania, we feel like crying like the man of Macedonia to our million brethren in the great middle west, "Come over and help us!" If you can't come, send in the May offering by way of Cincinnati.

It seems to me it is a hard-hearted Disciple who can read the appeal of W. J. Wright in Half Hour with Home Missions, the A. C. M.

March, April, May

There is a best time for doing everything—that is, a time when a thing can be done to the best advantage, most easily and most effectively. Now is the best time for purifying your blood. Why? Because your system is now trying to purify it—you know this by the pimples and other eruptions that have come on your face and body.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Are the medicines to take—they do the work thoroughly and agreeably and never fail to do it.

Hood's are the medicines you have always heard recommended.

"I cannot recommend Hood's Sarsaparilla too highly as a spring medicine. When we take it in the spring we all feel better through the summer." Mrs. S. H. NEAL McCrays, Pa.

Hood's Sarsaparilla promises to cure and keeps the promise.

S. leaflet just sent out, and refrain from shedding tears over this great mission field.

I am in a mission of the A. C. M. S. and our state board in Waynesboro; other places need help, but how can one person reach them? A good sister in York, Pa., tells me she has lain awake at night thinking of a mission there. For Wilmington, Del., our neighbor, S. T. Willis, in New York, makes an appeal. Oh brethren, we need prayers, we need preachers, we need pay that we may do more for the cause of Christ here. Remember! May 1.

Our Sunday-school at this place is growing each Sunday, and last Sunday morning we had our largest attendance at church. At night I preached at Fairfield, Pa., to a good audience, where a dozen brethren are preparing to get a lot and build.

Waynesboro, Pa.

Northern California.

Brother Day, from Missouri, we understand, has been called to Eureka and may be on the ground now.

In our last we stated that Bro. D. Stewart, of Tulare, had been called to Hanford. When he offered his resignation, the brethren at Tulare said no and raised his salary, and so he remains. We are glad he is to remain, for he is doing an excellent work there.

I have heard from an unofficial source that C. C. Bentley, of Olathe, Kan., has now been called to Hanford.

R. E. Jape has gone from Williams to Bakersfield, and we look for a work to result that shall tell for Christ and eternity.

The Colusa meeting by A. L. Platt and D. W. Honn resulted in thoroughly reviving that church and adding 26, which included the heads of several of the very best families in the city.

The Hazelriggs meeting at Napa has been a success. Over 30 added last report. These meetings are both remarkable in that they had almost continuous rains and floods to contend with, and yet several times people were turned away for lack of standing room in the houses. This is something novel for California.

Our indefatigable State Board president, A. C. McKeever, of Fresno, though pastor of the largest church in the state, yet has found time to run out and hold the second meeting since last state convention, this time at Sanger, a small town. A most excellent meeting has resulted with packed houses and 31 additions, several heads of prominent families. That town has received a shaking up that it won't soon forget.

Our missionaries have added over 100 to the churches in the month of February, and it was the most unfavorable month of the winter because the wettest month.

Gallaboun and Carroll closed a meeting at Galt with seven added and the church reorganized. This was a dead church. Brother Gallaboun now begins a short meeting at Clay.

J. A. Carroll assists A. L. Platt in a meeting at Selma this month.

The Hazelriggs go to Santa Cruz, and we look for a great meeting there.

R. L. McHatton is in a meeting at Red Bluff, but we have not heard any report from it.

C. E. Daugherty, recently from Oregon, has been called to the work at Paso Robles.

Bro. Wm. F. Cowden begins soon campaigning in this state for the May offering.

Never in our history was there as much active, aggressive, enthusiastic zeal manifested as right now. The Lord bless all efforts to the glory of Jesus Christ and the salvation of men and women.

Healdsburg. J. P. DARGITZ, Cor. Sec.

Canton Notes.

Bro. D. Dunkleberger finished his meeting, at Coatsburg, Ill., with 23 additions. The debating contest between three students of Eureka, Ill., Christian College and three of the Christian University of Canton was a complete victory for Canton. Brother Bayard received the Dr. Thompson prize of $5 for having made the best speech in the debate.

On the evening of March 17, the post-graduates gave a banquet to the senior graduates at the Canton House. Twenty persons were present. A very excellent supper was served, and numerous toasts and responses were given by various members of the graduating classes. The entertainment lasted until after midnight, and all retired, feeling the banquet was a success.

About ten of the leading student preachers of the university will graduate in June and leave to locate in various states of the Union. This will leave about twenty-five or thirty churches to be served by the Bible students who will be here next year. This gives a rare opportunity for preachers of experience to come here for review and make expenses while in school.

J. V. Combs, of Indianapolis, is here in a meeting. He is an able man, and we feel great good will be accomplished.

Bro. B. G. Revis was recently honored by one of his churches by being presented with a gold watch and chain. Thus a substantial memento was bestowed upon a substantial, earnest preacher.

Canton, the church and faculty of Christian University have made many sacrifices in the erection of our new building, which will soon be ready for use. Who will perpetuate his name in a good work by giving it the quarter of a million dollars which it ought to have for endowment?

H. D. Williams, formerly a student of Drake University and assistant Bible teacher at Bethany and Ann Arbor, Mich., has been selected to fill the place in our faculty made vacant by the death of Professor Youngblood. Professor Williams is a Greek, Latin and Hebrew scholar, and being up in modern school work, will prove an able acquisition to our faculty.

In a short time we will be in our new building.

PETER CONFESSES THE CHRIST.—

Mark 8:27-38.

(Read also Matt. 16:13-28.)

Memory Verses 34, 35.

GOLDEN TEXT:—Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.—Matt. 16:16.

The Message and the Messenger.

During that part of His public ministry in which He had been speaking primarily to the casual crowds which gathered about Him and only secondarily to His chosen disciples, Jesus had said relatively little about Himself. He had delivered certain principles of right living, certain ideas of God, of human duty and of the way of blessedness, but He had not said much about Himself and His own mission. Now that He has turned His attention to the instruction of the Twelve who are to perpetuate His message, it becomes necessary to throw some emphasis upon Himself as the messenger. It has often been said that in the transition from the preaching of Jesus to the preaching of the apostles there was a transfer of emphasis from the message to the messenger. But the transfer did not come at that point, and it was not the result of the perversion of the divine plan. The change of emphasis came with Jesus when He began to prepare the Twelve for the work of creating a permanent organization or society as the exponent and embodiment of the principles which He had laid down.

The Central Fact.

The time has now come for the grouping and organizing of the principles of Jesus about one central fact—the fact of Jesus Himself as a divine personality doing a divinely appointed work. So long as His principles were declared from His own lips, and His own personality was present as a factor which could not be mistaken or ignored, it was not necessary to say much about Him. But when the message was to be delivered by other lips than His and without His physical presence, then it became necessary to give unity to His principles by grouping them about this one central fact. The change was only putting the personality of Jesus into words so that it might be a permanent possession.

Peter's Confession.

As Jesus and the disciples passed through the region of Cesarea Philippi, He asked them who people supposed Him to be. They said that nearly everyone took Him for a prophet, some John the Baptist, some Elijah, and some another of the old prophets. "But whom say ye that I am?" "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." This was not Peter's first confession. On a former occasion (John 6:68, 69), in answer to the question whether they would go away with the fickle multitude, Peter said, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and know Thou art the Holy One of God." On that occasion Peter's faith in Jesus was a fact upon which to base his personal choice and his immediate course of action. Now, months later and after a much deeper experience, his faith, though expressed in almost the same words, is a fact on which to base a life-long service and an age-long organization by which the influence and ministry of Jesus was to be perpetuated. Peter's confession was in part the confession of a Jew recognizing in Jesus the expected Messiah of his people. But it was more than that, for in calling Him the Son of God he ascribed to him a rank and dignity which even Messianic expectation did not attribute to the Coming One.

"Upon This Rock."

The words are found in Matthew only. They refer to the foundation of the church—not Peter, but Christ, and the recognition of Christ's divine sonship as just now voiced by Peter. Three elements make up the one great fact upon which the church is built: First, the very character of Christ as a power in the world independent of all definition of His person and all question as to his nature; second, the divinity of Christ as truly and uniquely the Son of God; third, the vision of Christ as Messiah, Mediator, Lord and Savior. These three constituent elements make up the tremendous fact of Christ, for which as the true foundation of the church there is and can be no substitute.

"Tell No Man."

It seems at first glance surprising that Jesus should wish to conceal the fact which Peter had just stated in his confession. Surely it was not fear which prompted Him to give this admonition, it was a part of His divine plan. Jesus never preached His divinity and Messiahship at large. He did not ask people to accept Him as the Christ until His Messianic work had been completed by His death and resurrection. In almost if not every instance, it appears that He asked people only to accept His words and deeds for what they were worth, backed by the force of such a personality as they could see His to be. Henceforth His relations to the Twelve must have been a far more intimate one, from the fact that they now knew His nature and His mission, whereas the public knew Him only as a wonderful teacher and healer of diseases.

Sufferings Foretold.

It was natural that after giving approval to Peter's statement regarding His mission, Jesus should go on to tell them something of the events by which His work should reach its consummation. From His words on this occasion we may gather the following facts about Jesus' attitude at this time toward approaching death: First, He knew about it; second, He considered it part of God's plan for the carrying out of His work; third, He freely acquiesced in it; fourth, He regarded it as the very cause for which He came into the world. In view of these facts, Peter's well intended interference meant the subversion of the whole plan of salvation, and it is small wonder that, viewing him now as one who would, if he could, prevent the very transition upon which the world's salvation depended, He should have turned to Peter and cried, "Get thee behind Me, Satan." As it was not Peter personally to whom Jesus referred as the Rock on which He would build the church, so it was not Peter personally to whom He now refers as Satan. It was the tempter whose voice He recognized in the suggestion.

The Price of Discipleship.

In that connection while the thought of His own cross was uppermost in His mind, Jesus laid down the law of sacrifice as defining the price of discipleship. "Whosoever will come after Me, let him deny himself." It is of a piece with the statement that he who would save his life shall lose it, and he that would lose his life shall save it. The farmer must lose his seed to gain his harvest. There must be sowing before there is reaping, there must be the sacrifice of the base things that hinder before there can be the possession of the things of permanent worth.

A Fortune in Eggs.

I get so many letters from my old home about preserving eggs, that I will answer them through your paper. I started 1888 with $36, bought eggs at 8 to 10 cents in summer, preserved them and sold in winter at from 25 to 30 cents a dozen. I preserved eggs 12 years and made $30,000. My niece started in 1894, with $10, which she reinvested each year, with the profits and now she has $16,346, all made from $10, reinvested for eight years. You can buy eggs from 8 to 10 cents and sell them from 25 to 30; figure the profit yourself. To preserve them costs a cent a dozen. I can't answer letters as I travel, but any person can get desired information by addressing the PEOPLE'S SUPPLY CO., No. 5, Moore Block, New Concord, Ohio, enclosing a 2-cent stamp; they started me. This is a good business for city or country. C. GREEN.

This commendation has been not only hearty and sincere, but also wonderfully unanimous. The ones who were quickest to assert the superiority of this version were those authorities who may justly be considered the best qualified to express an opinion.

The Sunday School Times pronounces it "The standard translation of the Bible for the English-speaking world." The Interior also declares it to be "The most excellent translation of the Holy Scriptures ever published in the English tongue." ## Midweek Prayer-Meeting.

April 6, 1904.

FAVORITE HYMNS.—

Col. 3:16.

Note. Let each one be asked to name one favorite song, which, on account of its sentiment or association, has been specially helpful. The whole evening might well be taken up in singing and commenting on these songs, with prayers.

The Classification. There existed, perhaps, a clearer distinction, in ancient times, between "hymns and spiritual songs" than we now make. The "psalms" of the passage probably refers to the inspired psalter of the Bible which is yet designated by that name. In that early time the psalms were no doubt used very largely in the musical part of the public worship, but not exclusively, as this passage teaches.

The educative function of hymns. The brethren at Colosse were exhorted to let the word of Christ dwell in them richly in all wisdom, "teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts unto God." We have almost drifted away from the educational value of our Christian hymns. We are seldom familiar with the words, and we often fail to study the meaning of what we sing. We cannot teach or admonish each other in song without giving far more emphasis to the sentiments of the songs we sing. The leader should often call attention to what a hymn teaches and in what respects it admonishes us, that it may be sung more understandingly.

How to sing with spiritual profit. Paul said: "I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also." (1 Cor. 14: 15.) These seem to be the two essential elements in any singing that is worship to God: It must be done with the spirit of worship and with an intelligent understanding of what we are singing. The heart and intellect are both involved in the proper worship of God in song. We cannot sing with the spirit any song or hymn whose sentiments we do not make our own. Better not sing at all than to sing what we do not mean or believe; for, otherwise, we cannot sing "with grace in our heart unto God."

Singing a universal privilege and duty. Singing is the natural expression of Christian joy, gratitude and worship. It is a part of the worship and all should participate in it according to their ability. The careless, indifferent way in which the musical part of our public worship is often conducted, is anything but inspiring and helpful. Few of the members sing, many have no hymn books, and those who sing, often do so with little or no spirit. Reform should be introduced at once where it is needed, in this part of our worship.

Singing, a means of spiritual development. How precious are the hymns that are associated with memorable experiences in their lives! Many remember the song that was sung when they went forward to confess Christ, or the song at their baptism. Still other songs are dear to us because they are associated with loved ones who have joined the choir invisible. And there are the old favorites that breathe the spirit of devotion. How our spirits climb heavenward on the ladder of spiritual songs! We love best those hymns that express praise to God for His redeeming love, and to Christ, who loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood. Next, we love those songs that express the truest and highest aspirations of the soul after God and holiness. No one can sing such songs with the spirit and with the understanding without being spiritually quickened and made better.

Prayer: Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the power of music and for the faculty of singing which Thou hast given us. Awake in us such a spirit of love and joy and gratitude to Thee that it can only find expression in singing spiritual songs. May we sing to Thy glory, through Christ. Amen.

HOW THE WORLD'S STANDARDS CONFLICT WITH CHRIST'S.

Matt. 5:43-48; 1 John 2:15-17.

For the Leader.

We are not to construe this topic so that a conflict will appear between the works of God in nature and the Son of God in the plan of salvation. The phrase here, "the world," does not mean the earth or nature. It has reference to the people who are outside the kingdom of God. World is contrasted with kingdom or church. We are not born by the natural birth into the kingdom or church, but we must be won for this by the gospel of Christ. As we stand, before the gospel reaches us with its noble plea, we are in the world, as the term is here used. It is an unpledged, a noncommittal and unconsecrated life. It may be vicious; it may be thoughtless; it may be a life under the influence of others; but its ideals are made up without reference to the Supreme Ideal, Christ. Its judgments are perverted, or, if not, fall short of the perfect as expressed in Him. The standards of the world are made with reference largely to self. Let us see, now, how they conflict with Christ's standards.

For the Members.

1. A standard is a measure by which we test things. The piece of cloth is brought to the standard length of a yard to see if it is a yard in length. But who makes the yard stick? Who determines its length? If any one can do this for himself, we are in hopeless confusion at once. Will not the man who has cloth to sell, want the yard shorter? And will not the man who has cloth to buy, want it longer?

2. The government determines the length of the yard, because its interests are to deal fairly with all the people in business. It is the sum total of all interests. We admit this. It is apparently the fair thing from the first glance. And the more we look into it, the more it appears as the only way in which the interests of all can be served. The standard, then, is of greatest importance. It is the motive back of its making that determines whether it shall be perfect.

3. Now it is here that the standards of Jesus conflict with those of the world. The worldly standards are made from the view point of self; and that, from the standpoint of one self. By this I mean that the world is not troubled much about how a certain standard of action will affect some one else, but, How will it affect me? Jesus considers all persons, not simply one, or those in a particular profession. His standards consider the interests of every man. The motive is to save all, not one. The basis, then, of the world's standard is the isolated self. The basis of Christ's standard, on the other hand, is the brotherhood of men.

4. Then another fundamental difference underlying the two standards considered is in the fact that the world only considers the interests of the person between the cradle and the grave. It is this life only of which it takes cognizance. Jesus considers this life in the light of what will be best in the life to come. It is because we are creatures of eternity that he says to us, "Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you."

5. Now who is right—the man of the world or Christ? Has the man of the world, the man of the selfish view, the man of the shorter view, the man with the this-life-view only, waiving the use of the gospel, and taking reason alone, the more rational contention? Surely not. His plea that he is following nature is gratuitous. He is following a very inadequate and one-sided interpretation of nature. The standards of Jesus are made with reference to that divine wisdom that takes in all nature, the broader view, the universal consideration. Woe to us if we live by a shorter measure than His.

ARE YOUR KIDNEYS WEAK

Thousands of Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

MRS. SCOTT.

An interesting letter to our readers from Mrs. Gertrude Warner Scott, of Vinton, Iowa.

Vinton, Iowa, July 15th, 1902.

In the summer of 1893, I was taken violently ill. My trouble began with pain in my stomach, so severe that it seemed as if knives were cutting me. I was treated by two of the best physicians in the county, and consulted another. None of them suspected that the cause of my trouble was kidney disease. They all told me that I had cancer of the stomach, and would die. I grew so weak that I could not walk any more than a child a month old, and I only weighed sixty pounds. One day my brother saw in a paper an advertisement of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy. He bought me a bottle at our drug store and I took it. My family could see a change in me, for the better, so they obtained more, and I continued the use of Swamp-Root regularly. I was so weak and run down that it took considerable to build me up again. I am now well, thanks to Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and weigh 148 pounds, and am keeping house for my husband and brother on a farm. Swamp-Root cured me after the doctors had failed to do me a particle of good.

Gratefully yours,

Gertrude Warner Scott

The mild and prompt effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. Recommended and taken by physicians, used in hospitals and endorsed by people of prominence everywhere. To prove what Swamp-Root will do for you, a sample bottle will be sent absolutely free, by mail, also a book telling all about Swamp-Root and its wonderful cures. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and be sure to mention reading this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root; Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

Quiet Hour Thought.

May the Master save me from that self-deception that permits the lower self to shorten the standards that He, in divine wisdom, has made for me.

Our Budget

—"Now is Christ risen from the dead!"

—Let Eastertide be a season for renewing spiritual joy.

—"If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above."

—But we seek "things above" best by doing duties here below.

—One of the great tasks before the church in this country is the evangelization of America. The approach of May reminds us of that fact, and of the May offering.

—Less than a month until the World's Fair opens. Have we all done what we can to get ready for it? If not, there is no time to lose. We need more money for our World's Fair Pavilion, and we must have it soon. The building is going up faster than the money is coming in. See statement elsewhere.

—We are preparing to furnish our readers some inside news of our great Exposition, as it proceeds. Tell your neighbors about it and ask them to subscribe.

—Z. T. Sweeney will address Philadelphia Disciples in Kensington church on the evening of April 6.

—John L. Brandt is to supply the pulpit of the Presbyterian church at Pass Christian, Miss., during April.

—The day of the dedication at Dresden, Kan., has been changed to April 17, that being more convenient for Brother Lowe.

—McPherson, Kan., where Bro. W. A. Morrison is in charge, is in the midst of a Bible-school revival with encouraging results.

—We regret to hear that J. G. Waggoner is now at the Sanitarium at Kramer, Ind., trying to recover his health, but we are glad to learn that he is improving.

—We assume that our readers are interested in the recent congress, held in Chicago, and a report of the same will be found elsewhere in this number.

—The home missionary rally is to be held in the Central Church of Christ, Columbus, Ohio, on April 14, when Z. T. Sweeney will deliver the chief address.

—Since the March offering, the churches, as churches, have given $19,485, a gain of $3,409 over the corresponding time last year, or a little more than 21 per cent.

—The church at Franklin Circle, Cleveland, O., reports $1,000 assured for foreign missions. We believe this is the largest gift from any one church reported to date.

—It is good news to be able to report that about 250 churches have already given this year that did not give last. No doubt the number will reach at least 500 before the close of the year. Let care be taken, however, that all the churches that gave last year stay in the column of contributors this year.

I am proud of my lamp-on them.

MACBETH.

How to take care of lamps, including the getting of right-shape chimneys, is in my Index; sent free.

MACBETH, Pittsburgh.

PAUL MOORE,

Who will be Assistant Editor of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST after April 1.

—The church at South Bend, Ind., and the churches in St. Joseph county become a Living Link in the Foreign Society. P. J. Rice is the minister at South Bend.

—We regret to learn of the death of the little son of Bro. E. T. McFarland, who was sick only a short time. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST extends its sincere sympathy to the bereaved parents.

—D. C. Brown, an able minister of the Methodist Church, has just been immersed at Austin, Tex., by J. W. Lowber. Mr. Brown comes very highly recommended by his Methodist brethren.

—E. S. Muckley reports that the First Church of Portland, Ore., gave $65.75 for foreign missions. This is more than six times as much as was given in 1903, and more than ten times as much as in 1902.

—Missourians will bear in mind the Missouri Christian Lectureship which meets in Fulton, April 11-14. The place, the time of year, the occasion, all conspire to make the meeting one of unusual interest.

—C. C. Bently has accepted the pastorate of the church at Hanford, Calif., and Olathe has called Luther Moore, of Akron, Ohio. At the latter church there have been four conversions in baptism since last report.

—T. J. Legg, state evangelist for Indiana, has organized a new church at Epsom, Ind., with 50 members, including the best business men in the town. They have bought a good house and organized a Sunday-school.

—In spite of mud, bad weather and the city election, Brother Ranshaw gave a fine lecture at Bloomfield last week. D. A. Wickizer writes that they are waiting on the completion of their plans for a new building there.

—The Christian church at Maplewood, St. Louis, is to be dedicated on Lord's day, April 3, at 3 P. M. The ministers and brethren of this city are cordially invited to attend. J. M. Hoffman, of Iowa, is to preach the sermon.

—The editor attended Bro. Small's meeting at Jacksonville, Fla., again, one evening on his return home. There was a fine audience, an excellent sermon, good interest and about forty additions in the three weeks which the meeting has been in progress.

—A reader thinks the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has been too solemn of late, having a sort of "Let-us-take-a-walk-to-the-cemetery" air about it! Some folks can't stand the suggestion of the cemetery! Really we will have to enlarge our joke column for the benefit of our fun loving reader. We are bound to please. But after all, it may be a case of a bad liver on the part of the reader, for it is said that makes everything look solemn.

—M. J. Ferguson writes that he is expecting to make his home in central California, and desires to surround himself with brethren who will co-operate in the Lord's service and worship, in a real Christian colony. He can be communicated with at 661 West 38th St., Los Angeles.

—The Foreign Society reports a steady and encouraging gain in the receipts from the churches for foreign missions. Let the good work continue until every church is enrolled. It is particularly gratifying to note a higher standard of liberality in the churches this year than ever before.

—The 108th annuity gift to the Church Extension Society is from a friend in Ohio, the amount being $500. The Church Extension fund is now $410,000. A new-named loan fund was established on March 22, in the name of Sarah A. Holman, of Peoria. This is the twelfth named fund in our Church Extension work.

—The revival at Iowa City attracted great crowds at the Christian church. All the meetings were characterized with intense earnestness and zeal. It is said to have been the most remarkable meeting ever held in the city. Brother Moninger won the hearts of all who heard him. We have not yet received the exact number of additions.

—There were three valuable additions to the church in Tampa on the last night of the convention—Prof. Ricketts and his wife and daughter. They live out thirteen miles from the city, but drove in frequently to the meetings. Prof. Ricketts went to Florida twenty years ago from Missouri and suffered great loss from the freeze, but he will not be frozen out of the state.

□—The question of "sampling" preachers, is one that is bound to come up sometime for discussion. Many of our best preachers dislike exceedingly the idea of having to go "on trial" before a congregation with a view to a call. The church at Keota, Keokuk Co., Iowa, has just abandoned this sampling arrangement, and extended to Bro. Charles Edward Wells, of Cherokee, Iowa, a unanimous call to the pastoral oversight. Brother Wells will begin work next Lord's day.

—It is time to be thinking seriously of going to Fulton, where the Missouri Lectureship will be held from April 11 to 14. The program is a fine one, and a large attendance is looked for. Those expecting entertainment should write at once to M. A. Hart. Among the speakers announced are Brethren Powell, Garrison, Dungan, Tyrrell, Lhamon, Marshall and others. That means some lively as well as inspiring talk. We heartily re-echo Bro. Kokendoffer's wish that we may "have a great lectureship."

—The Y. M. C. A. at Treadwell Island, Alaska, is now occupying the jail for temporary quarters. This is due to the destruction of its own building by fire. It will soon erect a new structure and be aided, as before, by the mining company. The general manager of the Great Northern Railroad, it is pleasant to report, says: "I look for the rapid extension in the northwest of railroad associations." We cannot have too many of these associations in that great district where men are crowding in, and the churches have not yet possessed the land.

—M. L. Buckley, of Harrison, Ohio, reports the foreign mission offering as $52.05, which it is hoped will be raised to $60. Fairfield, Iowa, where A. R. Adams labors, raised the largest missionary offering ever taken by that congregation, which was three dollars more than their apportionment of $35. J. H. Wood, of Shelby, Mo., has sent T. A. Abbott $25 for state missions and raised $50 for foreign missions last Sunday.

—Arrangements have been made by which Bro. Thomas D. Butler, of Headsburg, Calif., will become associated with F. F. Grim in the office editorship of the Christian Century. This will bring Brother Butler into closer association with his son in Chicago, who is a prominent newspaper and advertising man, controlling what is known as the "Five Leaf Clover" papers. We congratulate Brother Butler on his return to journalistic work, and trust that he may find a field of great usefulness in Chicago.

—Howard T. Cree closes his pastorate with the Central Christian Church, St. Louis, on April 3, and on the following Sunday will take up his new work at Augusta, Ga. He carries with him the respect and esteem of the people of St. Louis, both in and out of the church. The Ministers' Association of this city, in a resolution of regret at Brother Cree's departure, said: "Having enjoyed rich fellowship with him, entertaining a very high esteem for his eminent abilities and his devotion to the Master and to the gospel of Christ, and viewing with much appreciation the splendid work he has accomplished in his pastorate in St. Louis, we not only pray, but venture also, to predict for him a very large degree of usefulness in the service of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ. Most cordially do we commend Brother Cree to the confidence and Christian fellowship of pastors and churches wherever he may labor for the Master."

—The Southern Evangelist contains a letter from Bro. J. S. Lamar dated at Warrenton, Ga., March 21, giving an account of the recent burning of his home in Groveton, Ga. Bro. Lamar was not living in his home at the time, but, as he says, was working his way back to it and intending to make it the refuge of his closing years. He had a little insurance upon it, but wholly insufficient, with present prices of material and labor, to rebuild it. We believe it will be a joy to brethren who know and love Bro. Lamar to show him a token of appreciation by assisting him in rebuilding his little home. This Christ-like deed would accomplish two purposes: it would show Bro. Lamar how his brethren love him, as well as furnish him a home in which to close peacefully his beautiful and fruitful life. A word to the loving-hearted is sufficient. Note the address as given above, and send him a letter of sympathy with an enclosure.

—As an addendum to report of Florida Convention, elsewhere, we may state that the following ministers from the state were present: T. J. Longdon, Jr., De Land; S. J. White, Lake Butler; T. A. Cox, McIntosh; B. F. Manire, Palmetto; J. P. Rowilson, Tampa; J. C. McReynolds, Daytona; A. Flower, Tampa; J. T. Boone, Jacksonville. The personnel of the two boards are as follows: State C. W. B. M. Board—Miss Rebel Withers, president; Mrs. R. T. Walker, vice-president; Mrs. F. M. Call, recording secretary; Miss Iola Liddon, treasurer; Mrs. H. M. Longdon, corresponding sec-

Groves, treasurer; C. W. Zaring, corresponding secretary. The evangelists are: T. J. Longdon, Jr., De Land; T. A. Cox, McIntosh, and B. F. Manire, Palmetto. The latter town is on the Manatee river, an estuary from Tampa Bay, where there is a group of towns in the midst of a fine fruit and gardening country, without a church of our own, and with only a few members. Brother Manire has a daughter living in Manatee, and an effort will be made to sustain him in that field. It is about fifty miles south of Tampa, from which place it is reached by rail or boat.

—We regret to record the death of I. E. Barnum, of Denver, Colo., where he was a citizen for twenty-seven years. Judge Barnum was one of the "characters" of the beautiful city of the plains, and was easily the most distinguished Disciple in Colorado. He held the office of elder in the Central Christian Church for twenty-five years under ten different pastors. Educated in the University of Michigan, he was more than a lawyer, for he had a distinct poetic temperament. David, to him, as a poet, was greater than Shakespeare. His attitude toward Christianity was shown in his close association with the work of the church. He assisted in the organization of the Colorado Christian Missionary Society, and his legal talent was at the disposal of all religious organizations without fee. He will be greatly missed, though during the last year or two, owing to ill health, he has not been able to take such an active part in the work as formerly. Recently he uttered this wish: "I want to deliver one more address before our state convention before I go home. I want to speak of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and its work, especially in what it has done in and for Colorado." But death came and this privilege was denied him. Our readers will recall a beautiful series of reminiscence articles from his pen which appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a few years since. Our sincere sympathies are tendered to the surviving members of his family.

Statement of the World's Fair Building Fund.

Amount pledged to date..... $2,857.50
Amount of cash received on above... 817.50

At least one thousand dollars is needed yet to complete the building itself, which is certainly the least that can be done. The building will soon be under roof and will meet a great want of our people through the seven months of the World's Fair, and can be made a great center of missionary activity. Will not the brethren who read this consider it as a personal appeal to them to make contributions to this laudable enterprise? The material and labor must be paid for and the bills will soon be due. We ask for an immediate response. The editor's absence in the south for two months has prevented his giving the special attention he otherwise would to this enterprise, as chairman of the committee, but other members of the committee and sub-committee have gotten the work well under way, and we must now push it to completion. Let us hear from you at once. Pledges or cash may be sent to this office, or directly to the treasurer, J. H. Allen, 104 South Main Street, St. Louis.

zeal and of wisdom. Brother Rowilson says his presence and his counsel are a constant benediction to him and to the church. We also met here Brother Hoover, one of our ministers in the state, who assisted Brother R. in the services. It was a day of sweet fellowship in the house of God, which we greatly enjoyed.

One of the trips which we would advise all visitors to the west coast of Florida to take is one which we took yesterday, Monday, on the steamer "Manatee," from this city to the Manatee River, and up it a distance of perhaps ten miles and return. It is an all-day trip, the boat leaving the dock here at 7:30 A. M. and returning at 7 P. M. We felt the need of a quiet, restful day, and found this trip to be most charming and restful. The Manatee is really a broad estuary, or arm of the bay, about fifty miles south of Tampa. The boat touches St. Petersburg, sighting Port Tampa City to the right before doing so, and then, veering its course a little east of south, it crosses the bay to the east side and enters the mouth of the Manatee, stopping at the towns on each side to unload or receive freight, and to deliver the mail. Here are Palma Sola, Palmetto, Braidenton, Manatee, Manavista and El-lenton, where the boat begins its return journey. This is the famous orange and grape fruit country, and the trucking business is carried on extensively. As the boat glides smoothly yet rapidly along one watches the distant shore lines, sees the white gulls following the vessel, and the playful porpoises sporting in the water, and is never without some object of interest. As our boat turned into the harbor the crescent moon was lighting up its waters, and the bright stars were reflected from its surface. The convention begins to-night, and after that, home!

Correspondence

Our Western Letter.

I am inclined to day to jot down some thoughts on experiments along religious lines. Many things are, or may be, learned by experience. "Experience," the old spelling book with a blue cover, said, "is a dear school; but fools will learn in no other." But men and women who are not fools are matriculates in the school of experience.

Let it be distinctly understood in the beginning of what I propose to say that the Christian religion is a revelation. It is neither an evolution nor an invention of men. Its fundamental principles and essential requirements were given to the world by our Lord himself and by men whom he called, qualified, and sent into the world to teach and preach with authority.

He said: "All things have been delivered unto me of my Father; and no one honoreth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him." The Founder of the Christian religion also said: "All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth." This must mean all legislative, all judicial, and all executive authority. When Jesus sent his disciples out as missionaries he said: "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that rejecteth you rejecteth me; and he that rejecteth me rejecteth him that sent me." He also said: "He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me; and he that rejecteth me rejecteth him that sent me." He said, too: "I will give you a mouth and wisdom." "The Holy Spirit," he said, "shall teach you what ye ought to say." "It is not ye that speak," said the Master, "but the Holy Spirit." All of which concerning the Christ and his chosen representatives I most surely and heartily believe.

As the Son of Man was on the eve of his return to heaven he said to his elect representatives: "Tarry ye in the city, until ye be clothed with power from on high." This amounted to a temporary embargo, which was removed by the descent of the Holy Spirit on the first Pentecost after the coronation of the Son of Man as Lord over all. The embargo having been removed, all having been filled with the Holy Spirit, having received the endowment from on high, they "began to speak . . . as the Spirit gave them utterance." The Holy Spirit proceeded to make known through "the twelve" the Divine pleasure and purpose concerning the children of men. The nature and official dignity of the recently crucified Nazarene were declared. "Let all the house of Israel know." Said the preachers on Pentecost, "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly that God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified." Being pricked in the heart, the multitude who heard these words said: "What shall we do?" To this the reply was, the Holy Spirit still speaking: "Repent ye and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit."

Was this instruction concerning the way of freedom from sins for them alone? or is it for all men to the end of time. "The promise" of remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit "is to you and to your children and to all who are far off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call unto him." The instructions therefore given in Jerusalem on Pentecost day by Simon Peter, and those associated with him, are for us in these last days and in these ends of the earth. Let this be understood as settled once for all.

Now how can we best present and urge the claims of Christ?

A question of methods is this. "Make disciples of all the nations" is the Divine command. How can we best proceed to do this? "Preach the gospel" said the victorious Christ. But in what way can we most effectually bring the gospel to bear on the minds and lives of men? Reasoning and experimentation begin at this point.

Our children must be taught in the ways of righteousness. This is clearly our duty.

The Hebrew religion was both careful and emphatic on this point. "These words," said Moses, "which I command thee this day, shall be upon thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children." The Christian religion is no less careful and emphatic. One who called himself an "Ambassador on behalf of Christ," said: "Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath; but nurture them in the chastening and admonition of the Lord."

How can this solemn and important injunction be most successfully carried out? This is now the question.

"The American Society of Religious Education" and "The Religious Education Association" are organized to secure by reasoning, by a comparison of views, by experiments, a satisfactory answer, if possible, to this question. Some of the best minds and most consecrated lives in this nation are devoted to a solution of problems relating to the religious discipline of the young.

The Sunday-school is a human device. It is an experiment. If it has passed beyond the stage of experimentation and is now one of our fixed departments of the church, as an institution, the methods to be employed are yet subjects of investigation. How can the Sunday-school be made more efficient? This is one of our burning questions.

The Society of Christian Endeavor is another experiment looking to the same end, namely, the religious discipline of the young. There is not a word in the Bible about the Sunday-school, or, if you prefer, the Bible school; nor is there anything about the Society of Christian Endeavor. Both are human devices for carrying out the desires of the Head of the Body as to the religious education of the young. Many thoughtful men are not satisfied with the work of the Sunday-school. A still larger number are dissatisfied with the results thus far secured by our Christian Endeavor movement. Are there not more excellent ways of doing this work than any yet tried? Experience alone will answer this question. This, that, and the other method will be tried until something is found better than the methods now employed.

Evangelistic methods or methods that may legitimately be employed to bring men to a confession of Christ furnish an opportunity for experiments.

The methods of the Disciples looking to this end are familiar to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is not necessary to describe them. The methods employed at the present time are not the same as were the methods in use forty years ago. Are they superior? They have certainly grown out of experiments. Can they be improved? Is there not a yet more excellent way of bringing men to a confession of Christ than any that has been, or is now, in use? Who will return a negative answer? Who will say that it is impossible to improve along this line?

The South Broadway Christian Church is trying an experiment.

In this new country many are lost to faith in the Christ and to Christian living. How can the number of such persons be reduced to the minimum? This is one of our problems.

Persons come into the neighborhood of our church who are not of "our people," but who believe in God and in His Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. They are probably here only for a season. They bear the denominational labels with which we are familiar. As they understand the gospel, and themselves, they are living in harmony with its requirements. Who will say that they are destitute of the Spirit of Christ? "By their fruits ye shall know them." Such persons are pleased to worship with us. They are willing to assist us in our work. To hold them to their faith in God and in His anointed, to save them from drifting, and to place them where we may be able to help them to a fuller and more accurate understanding of the Christianity of the New Testament, we say: "Deposit your letters with us, abide with us as long as you will. We will bear ourselves toward you as friends and helpers. You will co-operate with us in wor-

A TEST EXPERIMENT.

Peculiar Power Possessed by a New Medicine.

Of new discoveries there is no end, but one of the most recent, most remarkable and one which will prove invaluable to thousands of people, is a discovery which it is believed will take the place of all other remedies for the cure of those common and obstinate diseases, dyspepsia and stomach troubles. This discovery is not a loudly advertised, secret patent medicine, but is a scientific combination of wholesome, perfectly harmless vegetable essences, fruit, salts, pure pepsin and bismuth.

These remedies are combined in lozenge form, pleasant to take, and will preserve their good qualities indefinitely, whereas all liquid medicines rapidly lose whatever good qualities they may have had as soon as uncorked and exposed to the air.

This preparation is called Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and it is claimed that one of these Tablets or lozenges will digest from 300 to 3,000 times its own weight of meat, eggs and other wholesome food. And this claim has been proven by actual experiments in the following manner: A hard-boiled egg cut into small pieces was placed in a bottle containing warm water heated to ninety-eight degrees (or blood heat); one of these Tablets was then placed in the bottle and the proper temperature maintained for three hours and a half, at the end of which time the egg was as completely digested as it would have been in a healthy stomach. This experiment was undertaken to demonstrate that what it would do in the bottle it would also do in the stomach, hence its unquestionable value in the cure of dyspepsia and weak digestion. Very few people are free from some form of indigestion, but scarcely two will have the same symptoms. Some will suffer most from distress after eating, bloating from gas in the stomach and bowels, others have acid dyspepsia or heartburn, others palpitation or headaches, sleeplessness, pains in chest and under shoulder-blades, extreme nervousness as in nervous dyspepsia, but they all have the same cause—failure to properly digest what is eaten. The stomach must have rest and assistance, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets give it both, by digesting the food for it and in a short time it is restored to its normal action and vigor. At the same time the Tablets are so harmless that a child can take them with benefit. This new preparation has already made many astonishing cures, as for instance, the following:

"After using only one package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets I have received such great and unexpected benefit that I wish to express my sincere gratitude. In fact, it has been six months since I took the package and I have not had one particle of distress or difficulty since. And all this in the face of the fact that the best doctors I consulted told me my case was chronic dyspepsia and absolutely incurable, as I had suffered twenty-five years. I distributed half a dozen packages among my friends here who are very anxious to try this remedy." Mrs. Sarah A. Skeel, Lynnville, Jasper Co., Mo.

worship and in work. We will try to do you good. There are differences of thought and practice between us. Of these you will hear. These matters we will study together. We both desire to know the mind of the Master.

We will study together the New Testament that we may come to an understanding of the truth and be made free by it."

There are now six letters, on deposit, of the kind indicated in the South Broadway Christian Church in Denver—one unimmersed Free Baptist, two Episcopalians and three Presbyterians.

Our literature is placed in their hands. They are made acquainted with our teaching and work. The constant effort is, as I have said, to hold them to their faith in God and in Christ, to help them in the way of righteousness in daily living, and to increase their knowledge of the Christianity of the Christ set forth in the New Testament.

This experiment has not been tried a sufficient length of time to enable me to report results. I am not an enthusiast over the experiment. We will see what we will see.

If this method of helping earnest men and women does not succeed it will be abandoned; if it succeeds it will be commended.

Not long since one of these persons said in our midweek meeting that he had learned more about the Bible and the Christian religion during the short time he has attended our church than in all his life before.

Maritime Provinces.

The work in the Maritime Provinces has made but little progress during the months of January and February. The reports of the churches and the Maritime Christian Missionary Society offer hopes of a more aggressive and fruitful campaign when the warmer weather of the spring months arrive.

In Halifax, N. S., R. Everett Stevenson is more than keeping alive an interest in the old gospel. He reports several additions for January and a healthy interest in all departments of work.

Pictow now has the services of Bro. F. J. W. Appleman, a native of Pennsylvania and a Kentucky University graduate. He is a worthy successor of Bro. Will Allen, who labored in that citadel of Presbyterianism for several years. It is a hard field, but with Brother Appleman we look for success.

Bro. R. E. Stevens is doing a good work in Port Williams, N. S. During his pastorate of but a few years, a new church building has been erected and the membership increased by fifty.

In Hunts county, N. S., Bro. W. J. McLeod, though writing little about his work, has not been idle, and has added a large number to the church in that section.

Brother Zimmerman, of New York state, has lately succeeded Brother Howard Murray at Melton, N. S. We know that with such a strong man as Howard Murray, the foundation must be broad and deep, and we predict, from what we hear of Brother Zimmerman, a successful pastorate.

Digby has a new house of worship, chiefly due to the untiring efforts of Bro. H. A. Devoe, who ministers regularly to the church.

In St. John, N. B., at Douglas Avenue, J. Chas. B. Appel has been the faithful pastor for seven years, during which time a neat house of worship has been built and a membership of over sixty gathered together. Last October, in a series of meetings conducted by the pastor, four were baptized. He will commence another series of meetings in March. His is a difficult field and he has met the difficulties well, and we predict that if he always retains a free hand, much more will yet be accomplished by him.

Coburg Street is at present without a pastor, the former evangelist, J. W. Robbins, for the time being acting as supply. We learn that Bro. J. F. Floyd has accepted a call to begin work about May first. We welcome him to the provinces. During the last two years, Coburg Street added 17 to her membership and increased her offering for foreign missions from $233 to $321.

Bro. H. E. Cooke, at Burt's Corner, is doing a splendid work. Though a young church, he has developed a lively interest in all departments of work and looks forward to a better future.

Bro. Ralph Gebbie is the popular pastor of the churches on Deer Island. He is a talented young man and held in esteem by his churches. He has done much good during a pastorate of one and one-half years.

The work at Latete, Mascarene and Bock Bay is being revived. Since the middle of January, when the writer took the pastorate, four have been baptized at Latete and others are to follow. We begin a series of meetings at Bock Bay, March 16. Offering for foreign missions will be taken at these three places. These churches have had no pastor for over one year.

The Maritime Christian Missionary Society report for last month is by no means bright. With no real mission work done, a remote prospect of securing an evangelist, and a depleted treasury, it still has hopes for a brighter future.

G. N. STEVENSON.

Indian Territory News.

About two months ago the writer accepted the work of Corresponding Secretary and Evangelist of the Indian Territory. Having settled at South McAlester, we began at once to visit the churches and missions throughout the Territory, which, by the way, are far more numerous than we had anticipated. We have been pretty well over the Choctaw, Cherokee, and Creek Nations, and have visited one or more points in the Chickasaw country. Every where we have gone we have met with loyal brethren, and a more hospitable people we have never known. There is also a remarkable spirit of unity and fellowship existing among the preachers of the Territory, such a spirit we have never seen surpassed and seldom equalled. A ministerial association of the Territory has recently been effected, of which Randolph Cook, of Vinita, is president, and H. A. Moore, of Sapulpa, is secretary and treasurer.

More Power to Blockheads.

The brainy and versatile staff correspondent of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, Dr. F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C., delivered his great lecture upon "Blockheads" in the presence of a large audience assembled in the Jefferson Street Church of Christ, Buffalo, on the evening of March 24. The lecturer spoke for an hour and three quarters, and held the close attention of his hearers to the very last word. The effort is remarkable in many respects, being strikingly original, witty, piquant and fairly bristling with sarcastic points, and yet characterized by strong common sense and abounding in practical and helpful suggestions. Blockheads everywhere ought to be greatly obliged to Dr. Power for his ingenious and skillful advocacy of their claims and his just inventory of their possibilities. It is to be hoped that the lecture will be delivered over and over again, until its valuable suggestions have become the common property of the overcrowded fraternity designated in its title.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

The school at Old Orchard holds up remarkably well, considering the very unfavorable weather under which the work is prosecuted; but the lot has been bought and plans are under way for the new house, so that the leaders are looking for quite a boom in their work later.

One of the remarkable schools and congregations, circumstances considered, in the state is the Second, St. Louis. First was their remarkable deliverance from debt. They will never cease thanking God for sending them W. Daviess Pittman. Then comes the fortunate selection of Miss Frankie McCarron to do their house to house work. So quietly and so successfully was his work done, that the school and church have grown right along. Then the opportune coming of F. A. Mayhall, just when Brother Pittman had very urgent demands on his time otherwise, so that the work has gone along in all departments. In the Bible-school, Superintendent Reeves allows nothing nor any one to lag, and the work done by this noble band is a great blessing to North St. Louis. With the offering of one of their most devoted men, Omar Harris, the school this year gives to our work about $25, a worthy example to some of our stingy schools that under the "poverty" plea give nothing, of which they should be ashamed, knowing their circumstances like your secretary does.

The growth of the Normal classes in Missouri this spring as very encouraging. Many individuals are using the various parts of the Normal Instructor, bearing on our present lessons. W. W. Dowling deserves credit for so excellent a series, which so timely bear on the life of Christ. Wish we had a class in every Missouri school.

Hardin has begun Bible-school and church work in earnest. The building has been moved into town and put in nice condition for worship and work, to the credit of the Christian women. C. C. Taylor has been their preacher, and they have looked to him for leadership and encouragement all the while, seeking the best and to do the best possible, as was very evident when I was with them. They were most liberal to our work in return, and such will grow and develop.

T. H. Head is at Coldwater doing good work for Christ, while R. B. Havener is doing likewise, having put in four new schools this month, and will seek to do for the brethren south of Marshfield as he did for Dixon. W. A. Moore is in Worth County, and reports that the county superintendent is helping every way, and they are planning to reorganize the Bible-schools of the county, as should be done in many of the counties. These are the men now doing a work that few of us would do under the circumstances, where little remuneration is possible. These men depend on their brethren, many of whom seem utterly indifferent. How can it be? Why not co-operate now? Why wait and withhold their dues? I appeal again to my brethren, that you help these good men by promptly sending in your part to their support. Do this "by return mail" if you would help us reach fifty new schools by June. We can do it with your help, and you can help us if you will, all pleadings to the contrary, and most of which will not hold good anyhow. H. F. DAVIS.

Constipation. Its Cause and Cure.

A person in order to be healthy must get rid of the waste products (or poisons) of the body. Nature has provided four ways to get rid of them: The Bowels, the Kidneys, the Bladder and the Pores of the Skin.

If the bowels become inactive, that portion of the food which should be thrown off lies in the intestines and decomposes, causing blood, nerve, liver and kidney trouble, and closes the pores of the skin, thus creating disease in the entire system.

You can immediately relieve and permanently cure yourself of stubborn constipation or distressing stomach trouble and perfectly regulate your kidneys and liver by taking one dose a day of DRAKE'S PALMETTO WINE. Any reader of this paper can secure absolutely free a bottle by writing to Drake Formula Co., Drake Building, Chicago.

A FREE trial bottle alone has brought health and vigor to many, so you owe it to yourself to prove what it will do in your case. Write the company this very day.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

Many of the auxiliary offices have not yet reported for second quarter; a few still owe me first quarter's report. You must not lose sight of the fact that our state year closes in March, as the convention comes in June. All reports not in by April 15 cannot be included in the annual report. It will take a year or so to get adjusted to the change of date. Meanwhile, every officer should faithfully do her part toward the desired end, that is order and promptness in our book keeping.

Did you notice in the Tidings the picture of Miss Caroline Pope, our new gift to India? Every woman ought to feel a deep interest and pride in this girl. Yea, and a deeper love for the cause which has constrained her with superb health, a bright home, both parents, brothers and sisters, to leave all, and cross the ocean to minister to the sick in body and soul. She is a trained nurse and was always engaged until she took the position as matron of the Mothers' and Babies' Home in St. Louis under our Benevolent Association, as a work for the Master. She served there two and a half years with entire satisfaction. This will prove a valuable training for future hospital work in India. Support her, dear friends, by your love and prayers, aye, and your gifts, for prayers without works cannot please God.

The Sixth Congress of the Disciples of Christ.

Foster laid stress upon the difficulty of establishing these facts by scientific historical proof. He did not assert his own disbelief of them, though some gained that impression, but argued that, even if they are not true, still the value of Jesus to the human soul is undiminished. The general discussion was participated in by a number of brethren, nearly all of whom took issue with the speaker at one point or another of his argument.

The subject of the Wednesday morning session was

The Relation of the Interpretation of Scripture to Christian Union.

The principal paper was read by H. D. C. MacLachlan, of Shelbyville, Ky., who presented a strong and philosophical view of the subject. He pointed out that Christian union upon the Scriptures must of necessity mean union upon an interpretation of the Scriptures. The Bible is not a pre-eminently easy book to understand, and it is, therefore, necessary to reduce the requirements as a basis for union to the very lowest terms, eliminating those items upon which there is difference of opinion in the minds of Christians who are equally devout, equally filled with the Spirit of Christ, and equally desirous of doing the will of God.

The reviews of this paper were by Prof. Sherman Kirk, of Drake University, and Prof. G. A. Peckham, of Hiram College. Both presented a more conservative view than that given in the paper. Prof. Peckham said that the old Protestant doctrine, "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible," is a good war cry, but nobody really believes or practices it, least of all the Disciples of Christ. We make little practical use of the Old Testament books except to discuss their authorship. Some parts even of the New Testament we make little use of. The object of Christian faith is not the Bible, but Christ. Yet the Bible has authority. If it has not, the problem of interpreting the Bible would have nothing to do with Christian union. The union must come at least upon the basis of the reasonable interpretation of the New Testament, and by pressing home the truths found in it.

The Doctrine of Retribution

was discussed by A. B. Philpott, of Indianapolis. There are four possible answers to the question as to whether there is a future punishment for evil doers, and whether human destiny is fixed at death: 1, universalism, 2, conditional immortality, or the annihilation of the wicked after a finite punishment; 3, purgatory, or the salvation of some of the wicked after a period of remedial punishment; 4, endless and irrevocable punishment for the wicked.

The words of Jesus on this subject do not justify a dogmatic statement on the subject. No word which necessarily means endless is applied to the punishment of the wicked, and no word is used which is the exact equivalent of our word hell. The doctrine of endless punishment is based chiefly on the Greek word aion, which means age, but does not necessarily imply endlessness. The word and its derivatives are applied to the Jewish ordinances, to the Temple and to other things which have already passed away. It refers to indefinite but not to endless time. The same word that is applied to future punishment is applied to future life, but our hope of eternal life does not hang upon the interpretation of a Greek word which is often used for transitory things. The meaning of the words used in relation to future punishment seems to be left purposely uncertain. The words translated damnation properly mean judgment, with no implication as to the verdict, and are so rendered in many passages. In view of these uncertainties, the following doctrines may be said to be accretions to the Scripture teaching: 1. The supposition of physical torture; 2, absolute endlessness of punishment; 3, the final damnation of the majority of the human race; 4, the unchangeableness of the sentence from the moment of death.

The tendency of evil to increase and perpetuate itself is obvious. The hell which modern thought suggests is an endless degeneration enforced by inexorable law. Nature teaches lessons of death and cruelty, but not of immortality and love. Modern thought, making much of the unbroken reign of law, has no data on which to base a conviction of future life, aside from revelation, but has every reason to believe in the reality and inevitableness of punishment for sin.

As to future probation, we cannot dogmatize. Many have felt confident that a loving Heavenly Father will never close the door of hope to a penitent sinner in this or any other world. There is a point in sin beyond which it is morally impossible for the sinner to become penitent, but it is impossible to prove either from Scripture or from reason that this point must always be coincident with the moment of death. But the law of the harvest as stated in the New Testament—"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap"—is in line with modern thought. Jesus has not thought it necessary to give us full information about future punishment, but the fact of retribution is not to be forgotten. The easiest alternative will be bad enough for the sinner. The Scripture doctrine is that future punishment is an awful reality, and that the present life is related to the future life by a moral sequence as boyhood is to manhood.

G. B. Van Arsdall, of Peoria, Ill., reviewing the above paper, said that if, as has been stated, the Scripture is silent as between future probation and endless punishment, we must have recourse to reason. Take the case of those dying in infancy. Setting aside as morally impossible the damnation of infants, there are only three alternatives: 1, Annihilation; 2, an endless continuance of a non-moral, characterless condition, a compulsory innocence based upon a lack of opportunity or capacity for moral choice; 3, an opportunity hereafter for the free choice of good or evil. A similar question is presented in regard to those dying in heathenism. If the non-moral child has a future probation because he had no chance here, why should not the immoral heathen have a future probation because he had an inadequate chance here. That the hour of death closes the door of hope is not fairly deducible from any teaching or parable of Jesus. The parable of Dives and Lazarus does not teach that death is the moment which settles one's doom for eternity, but that some men (the brothers of Dives whom he desired to warn) pass the point of fixation of character before death. But whatever may be the arguments in favor of future probation, there is no reason to believe that the next life will present a stronger motive for choosing God and righteousness than the ones which have been presented in this life to those who have heard and rejected the gospel. In any case we may be sure God will deal justly with all his children. Our greatest danger is not in the idea of too much leniency toward sinners, but in the thought that salvation is a magical affair which may be enjoyed without the transformation of character.

P. J. Rice, of South Bend, gave an interesting and able review of the same theme, taking the same point of view. He maintained, however, that the subject has but slight homiletical value. Our age does not readily respond to preaching which finds its emphasis in future rewards and punishments. The present consequences of sin should be most emphasized.

Wednesday evening was given to a reception and banquet of the Disciples' Social Union of Chicago and the delegates to the congress at one of the largest and best restaurants in the city. About three hundred and fifty persons sat down to the tables, and after dinner there were a number of very happy speeches. The occasion was a most enjoyable one. These social gatherings, which the Chicago Disciples hold quarterly, have become an important feature in creating an esprit de corps among our churches in that city.

The last two sessions of the congress, Thursday morning and afternoon, were devoted to topics which afforded less scope for differences of opinion, but were not less interesting than those of the preceding session. T. W. Grafton, of Anderson, Ind., read a paper on The Distinctive Mission of the Disciples of Christ.

After giving an able summary of the origin of our movement and the plea of the fathers, he stated that much of the work to which they devoted themselves has been thoroughly accomplished and does not need to be done again. Some elements of it were temporary to meet temporary needs. Their work was largely destructive; ours must be chiefly constructive. But there remain three elements of our mission which will be permanent until they have been completely accomplished: 1. The plea for unity. Federation is a great step in advance and we ought to welcome and use it, but with a full understanding that it is not the final goal. The Disciples of Christ still have the only plan for union which is practical and adequate, and they must not cease to press its claims or be satisfied with any compromise measure. 2. The restoration of primitive Christianity, its doctrines, ordinances and life. This must include the primitive zeal and devotion. The spiritual side of our plea must be more emphasized. 3. The conquest of the world for Christ by the apostolic method of evangelization. It is our mission to save the world, and if we have a plea which is pre-eminently scriptural, we must prove our loyalty by pre-eminent zeal as a missionary people.

C. H. Winders, of Columbia, Mo., supplemented rather than reviewed the preceding paper. Liberty, he said, is one feature of our plea which has not always been sufficiently emphasized. Thomas and Alexander Campbell asked only liberty. They did not ask the denominational churches of which they were members to give up their creeds, but asked only freedom for themselves. Nothing is essential to the making of a sect except a sectarian spirit. It is not a question between "d" and "D." The exaltation of Christ must ever be the prominent feature of our position. It is not back to the primitive church, but back to Christ. Our creed is not the New Testament, but Christ. A mistake may even be made in substituting a partisan devotion to "our plea," or to the written word, for devotion to Christ. The destruction of the creeds is being accomplished by sheer neglect. The Westminster Confession would have been revised sooner if the Presbyterians had taken more interest in it. Denominational walls are crumbling because their keepers are too busy with more important matters. This is our opportunity to press the claim of Christ and undenominational Christianity on the individual and the world.

J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., approached the same subject from a somewhat novel point of view by asking, What is the mission of a local congregation of Disciples of Christ? In the earliest days of our movement the Campbell tried to get immediate Christian union so far as they were personally concerned by staying in fellowship with the churches of which they had been members. Soon it was found necessary to start new congregations. This gave opportunity to present an object lesson of the New Testament church, although it also postponed the hope of immediate union. To accomplish its own work and be a proper example to other churches, the local congregation must do the following things: 1. show zeal for scriptural evangelism; 2. promote a knowledge of the will of God through intelligent Bible study; 3. avoid exhibitions of bitter and sectarian spirit; 4. avoid flings and slurs at other religious bodies and, while bearing our testimony against denominationalism as a finality, be not so eager for proselytes as to hinder our mission to the churches; 5. lead in every movement for practicing union or co operation, both at home and abroad; 6. emphasize the importance of individual Christian character. Christians must be united with Christ in spirit before they can be united with each other.

The discussion of this topic was interesting and fraternal. It showed an entire willingness to maintain the things for which we have always stood, together with an open recognition of the need of doing so in a peaceful and Christ-like spirit.

The closing session was devoted to a consideration of

The Present Outlook for Christian Union.

The principal paper was read by M. E. Harlan, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who has been giving special attention to the union question during his residence in that city. His paper presented a hopeful picture of the present situation, and showed to what extent the movement for unity was gaining adherents among the leaders of all denominations. The paper was based largely upon answers given by prominent men of various bodies to certain questions which he had addressed to them. (See quotations in editorial, "The Desire for Union," in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.) Another list of questions had been sent to some of our own representative men, and their answers showed almost unanimous insistence on Christian union as the essential feature of our plea. But it must not be union for the sake of union, but for the sake of Christ and humanity. A union reached by compromise will be neither legitimate nor serviceable. To leave one human creed for another or to be magnanimous at the expense of scripturalness will not bring us to union.

The congress was well taken care of by the Hyde Park Church of the Disciples, and an excellent meeting place was furnished by the kindness of the Hyde Park Baptist Church. The attendance from outside of the city was about equal to that of former congresses. A feature of this congress was the increased time allowed for general discussion. Only one theme was considered at each session, and upon each topic there was one paper occupying an hour, and two written reviews of fifteen minutes each, followed by a general discussion.

The congress goes next year to Columbia, Mo. The following officers were elected: President, J. J. Haley; secretary, C. M. Sharpe; committee, J. H. Goldner, A. W. Taylor, Chalmers MacPherson.

Harrison, O., March 23.

CALIFORNIA.—Ventura, March 21.—Our two weeks' meeting closed last night with 13 additions: 10 by conversion and three by statement. The church is happy. Bro. H. E. Wilhite, of Oxnard, was the evangelist. He did splendid work and greatly blessed the church. He is a peerless proclaimer of the Old Jerusalem gospel.—ELI FISHER, pastor.

ILLINOIS.—Pana, March 23.—Bro. Fred Jones is with us this week in a meeting. We hold our services in the Congregational church, which we have rented, as they have no congregation here. Mr. Jones is preaching to very attentive audiences, which increase in number each night. Meeting will continue over Sunday. Our mission is steadily climbing the road to our intended goal, which is a church that will stand as purely Christian and nothing else.—M. C. LINTHICUM

Cairo, March 13.—On March 13th Lew D. Hill closed his very successful labors of fifteen months with the church at Cairo. During his pastorate there he has had 25 additions to the church: established a Sunday-school mission in the north end of the city, and strengthened the work generally. Bro. Hill leaves on account of poor health. He goes to Harri-man, Tenn.

Macomb, March 24.—Have just closed a week's meeting at country school house three miles from Macomb, resulting in five confessions and baptisms, and two others being baptized who had made the confession before but had not been baptized, thus making seven in all.—MARY PICKENS QUICKNER.

Arrowsmith, March 24.—We closed the meeting at Brook, Ind., with 67 added, making 152 in our last two meetings. We will assist the church here to build a fine $9,000 building.—EVANGELIST BENNETT.

Harvey, March 22.—Two more came forward last Sunday evening, making nine in two weeks. Our audiences are increasing. Interest is very good. Our mid-week evangelistic meeting is proving a success.—JOHN J. HIGGS.

Eureka, March 21.—You doubtless received my Illinois Notes a few days ago. I wish to make a correction if not too late. In last week's report I mentioned six meetings recently closed with aggregate additions of about 800. It ought to be 900.—J. G. WAGONER.

Windsor, March 23.—By special request I have been in a meeting for two weeks at Windsor, my home church, with 35 additions and a fine interest. We have no minister at present. Hope to secure for half or all time a good minister soon.—H. H. HARRELL.

Quincy, March 23.—Our foreign mission offering in excess of last year. Bad weather, else apportionment would have been raised. 25th and High Street Chapel—mission—largest attendance in Bible school last Lord's day. Over 75 out last night to C. E., and Bro. Jordan spoke thirty minutes.—E. S. POTTER, Chm. Miss. Com. of Board.

Virginia, March 17.—Simpson Ely closed a meeting of four weeks at Virginia, March 17. There were five confessions and one from the Baptists. The preaching of this servant of God left a profound impression upon the hearts of the people, and the church has been greatly blessed and strengthened by his stay among us. It was just such a meeting as was needed to bring the church into fuller realization of its divine mission and to broaden and advance its work in every line of Christian endeavor.—J. W. CARPENTER, pastor.

INDIANA.—Marion.—Five baptized March 20 at First Church, and one on March 13.—E. L. FRAZIER.

Knightstown, March 14.—I preached at Ligonier last Sunday, and baptized a young man in the river and preached a funeral in the afternoon. Mrs. Shaw filled the pulpit here to the delight of all.—ALLEN T. SHAW, pastor.

Indianapolis, March 23.—I closed last night a few days' meeting with the church at Nashville, Ind., with four baptisms, and two added by statement. The church was considerably revived. I will probably preach for them once a month this year.—J. A. ROBERTS.

Elwood, March 21.—Yesterday was an inspiring day in our church services. One young lady confessed Christ at the evening service. Several have been added since the close of Brother Small's revival, that have not been reported; have been too busy with funeral engagements of late to report. Will soon be here eight years, and there is a unanimous desire for me to continue. Membership has been quadrupled, and great good done in many ways. Hope now to report frequent additions. My brother Tom is doing a fine work at Greensburg, Ind. He is in a good meeting there now.—T. C. HOWE.

Bloomington, March 26.—The Kirkwood Avenue congregation are in the midst of a good meeting. R. W. Abberley, of Minneapolis, assisting. The first week has closed with 27 accessions, 18 by primary obedience. The meetings will continue for a couple of weeks yet at least.—T. J. CLARK.

Marion, March 25.—The four weeks' meeting held by Bro. J. H. O. Smith at the Central of Marion, Ind., resulted in 41 additions. The meeting was greatly handicapped by the severe February weather. But the result of Brother Smith's work was not confined to the meeting alone. Large audiences and frequent accessions have been the rule since the meeting, and 55 have been added thus far during the year.—M. F. RICKOFF, pastor.

IOWA.—Cincinnati, March 14.—On Feb. 13 the congregation and friends gathered to celebrate the thirteenth anniversary of the organization of the church. At the evening service Bro. D. A. Wickizer, of Bloomfield, gave a splendid address, and three responded to the invitation. After brief consultation we decided that we ought to continue a few evenings. We continued twenty-one days, Bro. W. being with us nineteen days. There were 101 additions—53 men and boys, 43 women and girls; 63 by confession and baptism, two from the M. E.'s, five from the Baptists, 12 reclaimed and 19 by relation. To those who know Brother W. I need not say that the preaching was well done and that the whole community received an uplift. A Y. P. S. C. E. of more than 40 members was organized. The Junior and C. W. B. M. will follow in short order. A month ago the Sunday-school had outgrown our building, though we have the largest in town by at least a third, and during our meeting we were very much handicapped for want of room. A lecture room will be added at once which can be thrown into the main audience room as occasion demands. This will increase the seating capacity more than 100. For the last ten months I have been preaching here half time. Now they will have located pastor and full time. During the last six months there have been a total of 120 additions.—W. H. COLEMAN, pastor.

Iowa City, March 21.—The best meeting ever held in Iowa City closed last night. There were 28 additions the last day, making 102 since the meeting began three weeks ago. The preaching was most ably done by Bro. H. H. Moninger, of Steubenville, O. Mr. Jas. S.

Helm, of Chicago, was leader of song. He is the best chorus leader it has ever been my fortune to meet. Of the 102 who came into the church, 77 were confessions, 15 from sister churches and 10 by letter.—PERCY LEACH, pastor.

Corning, March 24.—Our meeting is increasing in interest and attendance despite the stormy weather. Ten additions to date; nine confessions. Samuel Gregg is a powerful evangelist and a consecrated and unselfish worker.—CHAS. E. MC VAY, singer.

Ames, March 21.—Three made the good confession after the sermon yesterday morning. One added from the U. B.'s, and one by letter the 28th of last month. The field is ripe for a good meeting, and I have secured Brother Hougham, of Zeoring, Ia., to assist me in a special gospel meeting. Prospects are good for a splendid ingathering.—F. D. FERRALL, pastor.

Glenwood, March 20.—Four confessions at the morning service to-day—two newly married couples. One couple and a young man who made confession last Sunday were baptized at the close of the services.—WALTER L. MARTIN.

Cedar Rapids, March 21.—Three adults added here yesterday to the Second Church.—J. E. DINGER, pastor.

Keota, March 21.—Had four additions yesterday morning at our regular services—two by letter and two by confession.—H. A. PAL-LISTER.

New Sharon.—Two additions last Sunday morning, March 20. The work is prospering. T. J. O'Connor has been recalled to the work here. The call was unanimous.

Red Oak, March 24.—Two baptisms here recently not yet reported. We took the collection for foreign missions the first Sunday in March. Our apportionment was $40 and we raised $49.40. The financial condition of our church is greatly improved. Any one desiring to improve the financial condition of their church should write to the Ideal System Company, Red Oak, Iowa. They have the cheapest and best financial plan I ever saw. It has brought our church many times its cost in less than three months.—HERBERT W. CIES, minister.

Davenport, March 21.—I began pastoral work here Jan. 1, 1904. Our audiences have increased, and 19 persons have been received into the church at the regular services. Our offering for foreign missions was $50—the largest ever made by this church. We have a good property, a membership of 250, and by God's grace will try to give a good account of ourselves in the future. My long experience in the field has greatly enriched my life, but I turn with gladness to the joys of the pastorate and the home.—A. MARTIN.

KANSAS.—Sharon Springs, March 21.—Our Kingston, Mo., meeting closed with four additions the last service, making a total of 37, increasing the membership 50 per cent. Our Grinnell, Kan., meeting of three weeks resulted in eight additions, payment of the church debt and an invitation to visit there again. Our Sharon Springs, Kan., meeting is four days old with full houses and splendid interest. Of the 45 additions above reported 34 were by confession.—FREDERICK F. WYATT AND WIFE, evangelists.

Kington, March 19.—I held a meeting at Pratt, Kan., beginning Feb. 15; continued two weeks. Several additions. I have just held a meeting at Belmont, Kan., and organized a church with 24 members. They will support a minister part time. These meetings were held during the week except one Lord's day. Our work here is growing all the time. We have just put in a new piano.—RICHARD S. ROBERTSON, pastor.

Wichita, March 21.—One from the Methodists yesterday at the Lawrence Avenue Church.—W. T. McLANE.

Washington.—Evangelist Edward Clutter, of Cotner University, Bethany, Neb., closed a very successful meeting at Narka, Kan., resulting in 73 additions.

Caldwell, March 20.—We had a nice little meeting of two weeks; one confession and three by letter. Our work starts off very well; hope for a pleasant pastorate among this people.—LEE H. BARNUM.

Atchison, March 25.—Meeting here continues with good interest; 10 days and 14 additions. Edw. L. Ely is pastor and is doing the preaching. He certainly has the good will of the people here. Our chorus choir is doing good work. This is a fine people to work with.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON AND WIFE, song evangelists.

Iola, March 3.—Sixty additions up to date in the Omer and Sprague meeting at this place. Next Sunday we go to the Grand Theater, the largest auditorium in the city, in order to accommodate the audiences.—HATTIE HURLOCK, assistant pastor.

Winfield, March 3.—We have had 18 additions since former report. Most all restored to the faith; none by baptism. Over $1,000 have been subscribed to repair and beautify our church building. We will begin at once.—ALBERT NICHOLS.

Topeka, March 24.—State Evangelist J. Ira Jones closed a 32 days' meeting at the Armourdale Christian Church, Kansas City, Kan., with 42 accessions. The church has had no pastor and no building for some time after the flood of last June. They expect to engage a pastor now and be able to do a good work.—BERT I. BENTLEY, singer.

KENTUCKY.—Barbourville, March 20.—President J. W. McGarvey, of the Bible College, is here with me to-day to aid in ordaining the elders and deacons of this church. Bro. J. T. Brown, editor of the Christian Companion, is at Williamsburg, Ky., closing our long and successful protracted meeting there.—T. M. MYERS.

MICHIGAN.—Adrain, March 21.—A very interesting and profitable service Sunday evening, March 20. Two men and a lady made the good confession. Another man was received into the church who had been immersed in the "Church of God." One other accession by immersion not previously reported. Many are becoming interested in our work. The state convention will meet here next June.—B. W. HUNTSMAN, pastor.

Waldron, March 21.—The severe winter weather and the grip, measles and smallpox, have greatly hindered our work. Yet we have much to encourage us. Our church building is now complete. Best of all, we have all our debts paid and money in the treasury. Our last Church Extension note was paid Jan. 1, one year before it was due. I commenced my second year's work with the church March 6, since which time there have been two confessions and one from the Baptists. The Bible-school and prayer-meeting services are increasing in interest and attendance.—L. E. CHASE, minister.

MISSOURI.—La Monte.—I closed my three years' work here March 27; visible results, 50 additions and a new modern church building worthy of a much larger city. My successor will find many excellent people here, and the way open for a great work.—G. E. SHANKLIN.

Liberty, March 21.—There were three additions to the church here yesterday—two by letter and one confession.—ROBT. G. FRANK.

Warrensburg, March 21.—There were three additions at Dover yesterday—two by confession, one by letter.—KING STARK.

Bowling Green, March 23.—I was able to fill my pulpit here last Lord's day (having been sick for three weeks). Raised a small amount above our apportionment for foreign work. One made the good confession, Mrs. Lampton is slowly improving, being able to be up.—E. J. LAMPTON.

Charles Reign Scoville will begin a campaign at Moberly, April 24, assisting J. N. Crutcher and Central Church.

Warsaw, March 22.—Three additions by letter last Sunday. This is a good field for work. Expect others soon.—OLLIE DAVIS.

Marceline, March 26.—There were two more confessions here last Sunday evening.—A. MUNYON.

Golden City, March 24.—Our church at this place is on the improve with hopeful spirits. Our young folks will have Easter exercises April 3, and are interested in the preparation. We had two more additions at last Sunday morning services.—STACY S. PHILLIPS.

Sedalia, March 25.—Our meeting here starts off very well. Ten additions to date. H. H. Northcutt, evangelist.—J. M. RUDY, pastor.

MONTANA.—Billings, March 20.—The Disciples met here for the first time last Sunday. Bro. M. M. Eaton, of Deer Lodge, did the preaching. We have some 37 members here. Expect to have preaching every alternate Lord's day until October, when Bro. Simpson Ely will come to hold us a meeting, after which we will engage a pastor.—W. W. CLARK.

Bozeman, March 24.—Our meeting here starts out in fine shape; 13 added to date and a fine interest prevails. We have an open date for a meeting to begin about May 1.—LAWRENCE WRIGHT AND SMITH.

NEBRASKA.—South Omaha, March 25.—Five baptized lately, and two several weeks since. All at regular services.—LEANDER LANE.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.—Shawnee, March 21.—Three additions at last Sunday's service here, one from the Baptist Church. I desire to thank the friends who have written me concerning members who have moved here within the last year. Let others write; it is of importance to our work.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

Blackwell, March 18.—I begin work at Ellensburg, Wash., Sunday, March 27. There were five added here last Sunday. Have had 111 additions in my work here.—C. H. HILTON.

OREGON.—Pendleton.—N. H. Brooks, pastor, reports the meeting of S. M. Martin a great success. February a year ago Pendleton was a mission point of the Home Board with 40 members; 385 have been added to the church, 203 coming since Brother Martin's meeting, there being 60 additions in the week after the evangelist's departure, when the pastor took charge. One hundred and six new families have become represented since Jan. 16, and few of the converts were children. Brother Martin raised $1,400, providing for the building debt, and nearly all the new converts and many of the old members took a pledge to give one-tenth of their income to the Lord's work.

OHIO.—Bedford, March 14.—Six added to the church here by baptism; three other baptisms before, not reported.—J. H. MCCARTNEY.

Marietta, March 22.—Evangelist G. A. Ragan has just closed a short meeting at Reno, a country congregation in cooperation with Marietta, resulting in four baptisms, the re-establishing of the communion service, the revival of the Bible-school, the election of a board of officers, and the raising of weekly pledges for the current expenses for the year. The evangelist will continue in charge at Marietta for a few weeks, preparing the way for the coming pastor.

Newark, March 21.—Four confessions last night and four one week ago. Recently held a union Sunday night meeting with Baptists, and at close of service their minister baptized three candidates, and I immediately followed with eight baptisms. It was a delightful experience. Work on new building progresses rapidly.—H. NEWTON MILLER.

Bellaire, March 24.—Last Lord's day brought us six additions—three confessions, one reclaimed and a "Friend" and a Catholic whom I had baptized some weeks ago. We have about our apportionment of $400 for foreign missions. There is a great deal of sickness here this winter. Since Jan. 1 I have conducted twenty funerals.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Erie, March 21.—We have had 30 additions since we commenced our work here Nov. 1. There have been 16 confessions and two reclaimed from the Baptists within two months. We have now six prayer-meetings per week, three cottage meetings on Friday night, men's meeting Sunday 3 p. m., Y. P. S. C. E., and mid-week meeting Wednesday night. We gave $25 for foreign missions, which was three times what we gave three years ago. The Lord is with us and adding to the church the saved.—F. A. WRIGHT.

Allegheny City, March 18.—The First Christian Church of this city has had such a revival, quickening and ingathering of souls as will leave its lasting stamp on the congregation. Beginning with the inception of his ministry, Dr. Wallace Thorpe had planned and prophesied such a future for his congregation as inspired the members thereof to such most hearty co-operation with him. Sixty-one came forward during the revival services, made the good confession and were baptized. On Wednesday evening last, four who had not hitherto done so, came forward and confessed Jesus. We look for great things under the immediate leadership of him whom we love and honor as our pastor.—W. H. BRUFF.

Beaver Falls, March 25.—Closed a four weeks' meeting with the church here last night. Forty-seven added—44 by baptism. Bro. John McKee is the pastor here. It has been one of the greatest pleasures of my life to work with him in this meeting. Begin at Sharon the 25th.—F. A. BRIGHT, evangelist.

TEXAS.—Alpine, March 16.—The church here met to-day and elected a board of trustees and took steps to legally incorporate the church. They also elected a soliciting committee and a building committee, for the purpose of building a house of worship. The ladies' aid society is at the head of this good work, and is greatly assisted by the young ladies.—T. D. SECREST.

WASHINGTON.—Pullman, March 15.—Five additions by obedience at Farmington, Wash., where I serve half time. They made their first offering to missions March 13, which was a cheerful one. We note hopeful indications in the work there. I would be glad to serve some church within reach of Pullman on the first and third Lord's days of each month.—J. D. CARSON.

WEST VIRGINIA.—Parkersburg, March 21.—Sixteen added since last report, as follows: Yesterday, three by confession, three by letter, two by statement, one from United Brethren; March 13, four by confession and

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful It Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly every body knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but, simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists, sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I got more and better charcoal in Stuart's absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

baptism; one reclaimed Feb. 21 and two by letter Feb. 7. Largest audiences yesterday for months; work prospers.—J. D. HULL, pastor.

The White Brigade.

By E. A. Brininstool.

When the sun has donned its nightcap and the twilight settles down,
Then the "White Brigade" is forming for its march to Slumbertown.
Little tots who are a-weary with the pleasures of the day,
Form the sleepy-eyed battalions as the bands from Dreamland play;
And the little feet, in rhythm to the music soft and light,
Beat a drowsy, dreamy measure 'neath their uniforms of white;
With a blare of fairy trumpets,
And a burst of music grand,
The "White Brigade" starts nightly
On its march to Cradle Land.

O, an army strong and sturdy is the famous "White Brigade,"
When it dons its regimentals for its nightly promenade;
There are blue-eyed little fairies, rosy-cheeked and dimple-faced;
Dark-eyed dainty little darlings in the white ranks, too, are placed;
There are babies with sweet faces framed in curls of sunny gold;
Babes with ringlets dark and flowing in the army are enrolled;
And the Sand Man trills a measure
To the rhythm of the band,
As the "White Brigade" starts nightly
On its march to Cradle Land.

Through the valleys fair of Nod Land, where the blossoms bud and blow, Marching to the dreamy rhythm, see the dainty columns go!
Past the meadow lands of Shut Eye and river of Sweet Dreams,
Where the moonlight casts vague shadows and in golden languor gleams;
O, the strains of fairy music and the songs of love that sweep Down the hills and dales of Nod Land, through the town of Fast Asleep!
And the tiny feet beat measure
To the music of the band,
When the "White Brigade" goes marching
On its way to Cradle Land.

There are lullabies and bylows which the bands from Dreamland play,
When the "White Brigade" goes marching at the closing of the day;
There are airy, fairy snatches of the Sand Man's sweetest songs,
Sung in happy, childish treble by the ghostly costumed throngs;
And the star-world beams in beauty where the dreaming valleys sleep,
While the moonbeams laugh their pleasure as a-down the vales they creep;
And they linger in their brightness,
Lighting up the silver strand,
When the "White Brigade" goes marching
On its way to Cradle Land.

A Strange Child.

"O, my! what a whopper!" The boy put his hands into his pockets and looked at the small girl as he might have eyed a strange beetle or crab.

The small girl put up her chin and looked back at him.

"I don't see how you dare," said the boy. "Don't you remember what happened to Ananias and Sapphira and— and Korah and his company and—"

"Never seen 'em," said the girl. "Never heard of 'em."

"You haven't! Why, what do you do in Sunday-school, I'd like to know?"

"Sunday-school!" said the girl; "I don't go to Sunday-school."

"Then you don't know about—why, maybe you aren't so much to blame. I—was just going to chase you home, unless you took back that—"

"I don't take things back," said the girl, raising her chin a little higher and stepping a bit nearer to the boy.

"Not when you know they aren't true?"

"Not when I knows anything; not when I don't know anything, whedder or no!"

This was too much for the boy. He backed off to get a better look at the strange creature, failed to count on his truck, which stood behind him, tumbled heels over head, picked himself up, and stood looking at the girl, who hadn't moved a finger during all of this.

"It's a good thing you're a girl and don't have to grow into a man," he said. "You wouldn't make the right kind."

"But I want to be a man. I want to be big and lick folks, as they licks me. I'm mad 'cause I'm a girl. I shall tell all the whoppers I can think of. I'm thinking up one now."

"I've a great mind to chase you home," said the boy.

"Yes; that's it! Chase me away. Knock me over. Beat me. That's what folks mostly does to me."

The boy stood still. He watched the wrath of the small creature as it rose higher. He became dumb and couldn't speak at once.

"Come on. Chase me home. Don't let me get into anybody's time. Hit me!"

The boy sat down on the truck, then got up again.

"Why don't you hit me?"

"'Cause," he answered, slowly, "'cause I don't want to. I'm sorry for you."

The small girl's chin went down. The insolent look faded from her face. Her small, dirty hands unclenched, she took a step backward and looked over her shoulder, as if she were going to run away.

"Say," said the boy, "I wouldn't feel that way. Don't! Come, get on my truck; I'll draw you. Edith's coming to-night. She's awful nice. She's my sister. We're visiting here, in that house next to the Methodist church. My uncle is steward in the church. I s'pose they call him that 'cause he 'tends to the things for communion and love feasts, just as the stewards on steamboats 'tend to the meals. You'll like Edith. She'll show her dolls and things to you. She's got a pair of twin dolls, and maybe she'll let you play with them, if—if you'll drop the—the whoppers."

"Maybe I'll drop 'em; maybe I won't."

"Then you can't come near Edith. I take care of Edith."

"Then I'll stay 'round outside, and scream amd make faces and throw dirt. O I know how!"

At this somebody called, and the boy picked up his truck handle and went off, dragging it after him.

The small girl stayed about a while, then wandered off. She received a beating when she reached home for having run away. But all through the day she remembered that somebody was sorry for her. She remembered it the next morning, and as early as possible stole away and ran over to the place where she had met this one who had said that he was sorry for her. The boy and his sister were there.

"O girl! girl!" called the boy.

"Here's Edith. Come here!"

She came nearer. Edith looked up from her playthings. "How d'do, girl?" she said. "What's your name? Where's your doll?"

"Never had a doll."

"What?"

The boy came closer to her. "Is—is that a whop?"

But the look in her eyes made him stop. He turned helplessly toward his sister. The other little one—the happy one—understood. She got up and came forward with the dear twin dollies in her hands. One of them she laid against the little girl's breast (it happened to be just where her heart was, though Edith didn't think of that), then she bent the girl's arm up to hold it there.

"Take her," she said. "It's Elvira. I've a big family of dolls—though I love these twins most the best!"

The strange child's face became like the face of one who had seen an angel. "To keep?" she asked, breathlessly,

"for me to keep—keep, as long as I live?"

"Yes; longer," said the boy, earnestly.

Edith nodded her head seriously.

With a strange cry that was half laughter, half weeping, the child held the doll to her heart with both hands, and turned and ran away like a deer, still uttering that strange cry.

"Now we've lost her," said the boy.

"She will come back," said Edith.

And it was so. The next day she was there with clean face and hands, with something more tender than a smile upon her little hard face, and with the doll held close in her arms.

"Come," said Edith, "let's go visiting. I'll come on the truck to see you to-day."

For hours they played. Day after day it was the same. One morning the small girl said to the boy: "I don't tell whoppers any more. Don't you see I don't?"

The boy nodded.

"When do you go home?"

"Saturday."

"O, dear!" She held the doll closer. "It's easy to keep from telling 'em when you're here. But I s'pose I'll get back again when you're gone. How can I—keep—keep so?"

The boy thought very hard. He remembered something in the church service that always helped him to keep his good resolutions. Then he talked to Edith, who agreed with him.

"You must kneel down at the altar in the church," he said to the small girl, "and have the minister pray for you, while you take the communion—just as we do. Do you want to?"

"What is it? Yes, I want to."

"Do you want to now?"

"Yes, now!" said the child.

"Well, Uncle Hardy and Aunt Esther are away; but I know where the communion things are and the bread. I can fix 'em up in the church; then I'll fetch the minister. I know him a lot. He's jolly fine. He'll come and do it for you so's to keep you from whopping. I know he will."

Then the boy looked at Edith, who understood this time, also.

"Would you mind putting on some clothes just like these?" she asked; "I've got such a lot of them."

The child looked down at her wretched garments. "I wouldn't mind," she said. "I'll put 'em on, if—I'd ought to, to do that—"

Half an hour later the young pastor was overtaken by a breathless small boy, who pulled off his cap and said, "My! but can't you walk, though! Good morning, Mr. Ellsworth! Won't you come to the church quick? 'Cause there's a little girl who wants to be good and leave off telling whoppers. We've got everything ready but the wine. I couldn't find that, and Uncle Hardy and Aunt Esther are away from home. But I put some water on. 'Twill do just as well, don't you think so?"

Mr. Ellsworth turned in wonder, clasped the small hand that slid into his, and went with the boy. As he went he questioned and listened. When the church was reached he found that everything, indeed, was ready, even to the small figure which knelt, awaiting, while another small figure sat demurely in the pew beside two dolls—also very demure.

He took the matter in at a glance. His heart was very tender toward children. Drawing a small book of service from his pocket, he went within the altar. The boy slid into a pew.

"Come," said the pastor, "both of you, partake and receive the blessing with your little friend." The two went softly forward and knelt upon either side of the still little figure. It was well that the young minister knew the service, for his eyes were so full that he couldn't read a word.

"Christ forgive me," he was praying in his heart. "I was almost ready to give up. But thou hast, indeed, encouraged me."

The boy and his sister went away. But while she has many trials, the small girl is growing into a strong, brave, sweet Christian.—Christian Advocate.

Two Sacks.

An exchange relates an ancient legend describing an old man traveling from place to place with a sack hanging behind his back and another in front of him. In the one behind him he tossed the kind deeds of his friends, which were soon quite hidden from view and forgotten. In the one hanging around his neck, under his chin, he threw all the sins which his acquaintances committed, and these he was in the habit of turning over and looking at as he was walking along, day by day, which naturally hindered his course.

One day, to his surprise, he met a man coming slowly along, also wearing two sacks. "What have you there?" asked the old man.

"Why, my good deeds," replied number two. "I keep all these before me, and take them out and air them often."

"What is in the other big sack?" asked the first traveller. "It seems weighty."

"Merely my little mistakes. I always keep them in the sack hanging over my back."

Presently the two travellers were joined by a third, who, strange to say, also carried two sacks—one under his chin and one on his back.

"Let us see the contents of your sacks," exclaimed the first two travellers.

"With all my heart," quoth the stranger. "For I have a goodly assortment, and I like to show them. This sack," said he, pointing to the one under his chin, "is full of others' good deeds."

"Your sacks look full. They must be very heavy," observed the old man.

"There you are mistaken," replied the stranger; "they are big, but not heavy. The weight is only such as sails are to a ship. Far from being a burden, it helps me onward."

"Well, your sack behind can be of little use to you," said number two, "for it appears to be empty, and I see that it has a great hole in the bottom of it."

"I did that on purpose," said the stranger, "for all the evil I hear of people I put in there, and it falls through and is lost. So you see I have no weight to draw me backwards."

"Since that day I have never wanted anybody to explain to me what 'whosoever' means."

Queer Easter Customs.

A native Mexican Easter is a curious exhibition of ignorance and superstition. The people delight in processions and in ceremonies. At various places they enact passion plays which are very real to the Indians. The characters in the play carry out their parts with great realism. Until recently it was a common occurrence for a man to volunteer to be crucified; and actually allow his bigoted countrymen to perform the awful act. The volunteer was a criminal, who, if he came out of the ordeal alive, received a full and free pardon. It not infrequently happened that the man was killed, for he was made to ride with his face toward the tail of a mule, while the howling mob was privileged to beat him with sticks and stones. From this exhibition of brutal violence the people went to the church where the "tenebræ" was celebrated with loud cries of grief. Frequently dozens of people fainted during the performance. Native Indian women still do penance, by wearing a crown of thorns, and kneeling among the people in expiation of some crime. Undoubtedly, however, the most curious custom which survives in Mexico is that of the hanging of Judas. For days before Easter merchants display in the streets small and large wooden images of the Iscariot, and these are bought in great quantities by the natives, who hang Judas with much ceremony at Easter-time.—April Woman's Home Companion

A Better Way to Catch Rabbits.

When off duty, Professor Richards, of Yale, enjoys a joke, and his pupils often come to him when they have heard a new one. He adds to the fun sometimes with a witticism of his own. Such was the case when one of the students perpetrated the following antiquity:

"Professor, wouldn't you like a good recipe for catching rabbits?"

"Why, yes," replied the professor.

"What is it?"

"Well, you crouch down behind a thick stone wall and make a noise like a turnip," answered the youth, giggling in ecstasy.

Quick as a flash came the reply:

"Oh, a better way than that would be for you to go and sit quietly in a bed of cabbage heads, and look natural."—Selected.

Life Is Not Fragmentary.

Life is not fragmentary. There is no break. You see the river flowing till it reaches the cleft in the mountain, but it goes on. You see your companion entering the dark cavern of the mountain-side. It is but a tunnel; presently he will emerge into a fairer, brighter land beyond. Life is like a song; and the singer goes from us, and the song grows dimmer and more indistinct, and fades away; but the singer has not stopped his singing, though our eyes cannot follow the singer into the unknown whither he has gone. Do you remember that beautiful statue in the Metropolitan Museum of Arts—"The First Death"—Eve holding in her arms the form of her beloved first-born son, and looking down with pained and anxious questioning into the closed eyes? Oh, if there could but then have been someone to touch her on the shoulder and say, "This is not death, but is only slumber"; if there could but have been some voice that could have spoken in her ears, so that, suddenly rising out of this semblance of sleep, he could have looked up into the mother's eyes, how the joy and exhilaration would have come back into her heart again! And when we take our best beloved and hold them in our arms, and look down into the eyes that are closed, and look down into the face that is marble, there is a hand that touches our

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Since I last wrote to you, I have had a beautiful birthday party and the grip. Helen Ross sent me a box of delicious candy, made in her own house, and many of the Advance Society members sent greetings and kind words, which were thankfully received, even if they did not taste so well as the fudge. The party is now over, but I still have the grip. Good things can't last always, but when one goes, you are pretty sure to get something else. I am sending another $5 to Little Joe, making $15 sent so far. It does me good every time I think how we raised the money for our orphan. For instance, 50 cents comes from Hugh Carter, Higginsville, Mo., age 12. He made it in the harvest field. From Seattle, Wash., comes stamps from one who signs no name. Grace Reid, Christiana, Ont., who sends 25 cents, writes: "I would like to have Little Joe for my brother; I have no brothers or sisters. He would have a fine time up here in Canada, playing in the snow. The trees are all covered with frost, like a picture from Fairyland." In the meantime I learn that Joe is well and happy. Mrs. E. McLoed Davis, Golden City, Mo., sends 75 cents, saying, "This is a birthday offering in memory of our darling daughter who has been called to her home on high." From Wing, England, inclosing 4s. 8d., comes this letter: "God bless those who help in the Av. S. Orphan Fund. It is a splendid way to unite the willing members in a blessed enterprise. I take this opportunity to tell you that the Av. S. has done its good, if silent work, in unsuspected quarters. I have to deal with young people not of our persuasion, and they would not join a society whose headquarters is a nonconformist paper." (Those of you who are reading English history must feel proud to know all about nonconformity. You see it pays to read history, so you'll know what people are talking about. Let some one write, telling what a nonconformist paper is.) "But these children just revel in your stories, and I can assure you that for years my weekly paper has been hailed with joy" (and I am hoping they will think well of the Green Witch who will appear on her broomstick next week). "I try to carry out some of the Av. S. rules, but catch some young people reading five pp. history outside lesson hours! All honor to those who do." (Yes, honor-list.) "I send this money in memory of a motherless nephew of mine whom God took back to Him only a few weeks ago. Please don't give my name—a foreign aspect attracts too much attention."

From Akita, Japan, comes 25 cents and one of the sweetest pictures you ever saw. In a row on the floor are five plates, and in each plate, Japanese food—I can't tell whether it's rice or teagrounds, or what it is; before each plate stands a pup, one eating, another sniffing, another backing away from his dinner, and one apparently unused to his long legs. Behind the guests sits a boy holding the mother (named "Goo"), who has her nose wrinkled up making googoo eyes at the public. With the picture comes this letter from Henry A. Stevens: "I was going to send you Goo's picture for a Christmas present, but I forgot it, so I send it now. Santa Claus brought me some rabbits and a sword, but it broke, and a Japanese lady gave me another sword, and it broke, too. I would like to be a soldier, but I wouldn't like to kill any one or be killed myself, so I've changed my mind. There are so many soldiers in our town. They wear dark blue clothes with a pretty red or yellow stripe on the trousers and a yellow band around the cap. They wear a short sword buckled around the waist. You know there is a war between the Japanese and the Russians." (Why, yes, I have heard something about it.) "We think Japan will win. Many Russian ships have been sunk. We are knitting socks for the soldiers." (I wouldn't mind seeing Japan win, myself, but I wouldn't want to tell Russia so, for there is no use hurting people's feelings for nothing. Of course, as you live there, it is different with you.) Marie Holett, Liscomb, Ia.: "I would like to join the Av. S., but don't know the rules. I live in a town of 350. There are two churches and no saloons. My papa is pastor of the church of which I am a member. Our town is beautiful in summer, with nice large trees along the streets. How is Little Joe?" (I hope you'll have lots of fun under those big trees this summer.) Ruby Shira, Spickard, Mo.: "I would like to join the Av. S. Will you please put the rules in the paper? I have a cat, and her name is Ruth." (I would be pleased for her to meet Felix.) "I am 10."

The Av. S. rules: Resolve to read five pages of history and 30 lines of poetry and memorize a good quotation every week, read at least one Bible verse every day, keep an account in a note book, and report to me every 12 weeks. You are then put on the Honor List for one "Quarter." The following is our new Honor List: Josie Lineberry, St. Catherine, Mo. (5th quarter); Grace T. Hord, Grayson, Mo. (2nd); Henry Asbury Stevens, Akita, Japan; Harry Cash (17th) and Burleigh Cash (17th), Hood River, Ore. (Going to raise strawberries this summer?); Dorothy Brown and Earl Brown, Francesville, Ind.; Ruth Day, Sparta, Mo. (3rd); Melvin Ledden, Osapur, Ill. (11th); Madge Master (21st) and Eva Hawkins (4th), Ozark, Ark.; Susie Canby Searce (5th and 6th), Plattsburg, Mo.; Etta Christian, St. Catherine, Mo.; Edna Shriver (4th) and Ethel L. Harpole (2nd and 3rd), Nebo, Ill.; Manie Bayless, Mulkeytown, Ill.; Mrs. W. A. Mason (2nd), Nevada, Mo.; Ruth Sampsel (4th) and Mrs. A. D. Sampsel (3rd), Warrensburg, Mo.; M. Emily Day, Sparta, Mo. (10th); Mabel G. Damerell, Walnut, Kan. (5th); Bertha Beesley, Luebbering, Mo. (21st)—she is still teaching school; Helen Ross, Independence, Mo. (6th); Claire Saunders (2nd), Ozark, Ark.; Ada Miller, Sprague, Mo.; May Speece, Bucklin, Mo. (7th); Edna Bear, Iberia, Mo. (3rd); Sidney J. Chastain, Yukon, Okla.; M. J. O'Dell, Lebanon, Mo. (6th); Mrs. F. A. Potts, Chattanooga, Tenn. (12th); Jessie V. Underwood, Boyd, Ore.; Donnie Swift, Billings,

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

Simpson Ely, Joplin, Mo.: "I was near Plattsburg some time ago and expected to see you face to face, but could not arrange my route to that effect. It was a disappointment to me, but you were in blissful ignorance of my designs upon you." (Glad I didn't know, as the hen is now cackling which I should have slain to do you honor.) "I have watched with much interest the attempt to raise a fund for the orphan. I had no doubt as to the success of the matter, but I enclose a dollar. We sent you the first donation—perhaps this will be the last." (Will the Av. S. let that be the last? I hope not! Brother Ely has just moved from Clearfield, Ia. Welcome back to Missouri! Business Notes.

"Altar Stairs," by Judge Scofield, is one of the most interesting books in fiction going out of the house. The mechanical work is handsome, the price, $1.50.

The American Standard Edition of the Revised Bible is that which should be in the hands of all our Bible-school teachers and every minister, and the prices range from $1 to $10.

The new book by Dr. W. T. Moore is now ready and is "Man Preparing for Other Worlds," containing over 500 pages, discussing many interesting problems, and sells for $2.

"Grace Before Meat," by the king of writers for young people, Amos R. Wells, is having quite a run, and our reviewer failed to mention it is in paper at 25 cents, in cloth, 50 cents.

G. A. Hoffman's Pocket Memorandum for Ministers goes off as it should, being in full leather binding, 128 pages, and is for the vest pocket of the busy pastor, selling at 50 cents.

The demands for the Symposium on the Holy Spirit are such that we sold the last copy before knowing it, and if any of our friends will proffer us the use of their copy, will try and satisfy the craving for a "good thing."

J. W. McGarvey, always in demand, now more so while our lessons are in the Life of Jesus, and his Matthew and Mark are now having the "right of way," and Lamar on Luke is not slow. But these are good for all times.

Geo. H. Bowles, Freemont, Iowa, must be quite successful in his Normal efforts, judging by the orders for the Normal Instructor, while others are wisely making use of the Instructor in connection with their weekly study of the lesson.

The circulars, with illustrations, of the new marriage certificates and booklets, are bringing constant orders. The more "Wedding Tokens" are seen, the more they are in demand. It is only 50 cents, is much prettier than the ordinary certificate, and is always in sight.

The remarkable offer of Our Young Folks of the WORLD'S FAIR PORTFOLIO SOUVENIR is what it claims to be, for the Portfolios are retailing all over the country at 25 cents and are fine in every sense of the word, and are given with one new subscription to Our Folks at 75 cents.

The new Y. P. S. C. E. societies being organized over the country will tell mightily for the development of the young people of the church, and in keeping with their desire for growth. This department advises "Ideals for the Young People," by M. E. Harlan, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

That our friends not yet using the Lesson Commentary may see just what they have been missing, we are offering the $1 edition, for a limited time, at 50 cents, and this is for introducing this most helpful work among those unacquainted with it, believing friends thus made will continue with us.

The People's New Testament, by B. W. Johnson, has been in such demand in connection with our present Bible-school lessons, that our second issue is exhausted and we are hurrying another through the bindery and ask our friends to bear with us, promising that the orders will be shipped as soon as possible.

The American Revised Bible by the Nelsons, is now in the Teacher's edition, and has concordance and helps needed in a Twentieth Century Bible. The prices run from $2.25 to $10, with the indexed at 35 cents additional. Every minister and all good teachers ought to use the American Standard edition of the Revised Bible.

Quite a demand this week for the revised Testaments, which, by the way, are the English revision with the American preferences; and think of the prices, the New Testament in nonpareil, limp cloth, red edges, at 7 cents; the same in full cloth, red edges, at 15 cents; the same in long primer, silk cloth, 5 x 7 inches, at 35 cents; all postpaid.

The Endeavorers using the Bethany Reading Course books are loud in their praises, and well they may be, for think of "A Guide to Bible Study," "Hand-book Concerning the Disciples," "Hand-book of Missions," "Life and Teachings of Jesus," "Sketches of Our Pioneers," "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples," "The Prophets of Israel," "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," and "Heroes of Modern Missions," at 35 cents each, or any three for $1, cloth, and nearly 200 pages.

For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

Current Events

Federal aid in road-building is a plan which is commanding the support of some far-seeing public men and a vast number of private citizens. It is a notorious fact that, throughout the greater part of the United States, even in the more populous portions, the wagon-roads are of a quality which would be a disgrace even to a semi-civilized nation. There are reasons for this. Perhaps the most important is the fact that railroads began to be built about the time when permanent coach-roads would otherwise have been constructed. The European countries were opened up to civilization by the building of wagon-roads; railroads came as a later development; and now they have both. But our country was opened up by the construction of railroads, and wagon-roads have never been built at all upon any adequate scale. But now we are feeling the need. The net-work of railroads which covers the country is a tremendously expensive machine to operate, yet it cannot come into immediate contact with every farm and rural community. But the railroad needs the patronage of these isolated communities, and they need the service of the railroad. Hence the demand for good roads. The former enthusiasm for the bicycle and the coming prevalence of the automobile have given some stimulus to the good-roads propaganda, but these are mere side issues. The real reason for having good roads is the economic necessity which is coming to be more and more appreciated especially by the farmers. And the question is one in which federal aid may properly be invoked.

The Brownlow Bill, now pending before Congress, provides for an appropriation of $8,000,000 a year for three years to be expended for the building of roads under the supervision of a new bureau to be created in the Department of Agriculture. It is contemplated that this money shall be distributed among the several states in proportion to their population, except that no state shall receive less than $250,000, and that every state, county or town which receives federal money for road-building shall be required to add to it an equal amount for the same purpose. The constitutionality of such legislation is not seriously questioned. The constitution authorizes Congress to establish and maintain "post offices and post roads," and the extension of rural free delivery will soon make every road a post-road and give to that antique constitutional phrase a significance which it has not had since the days of the stage-coach. Moreover, the course which the federal government has pursued and is pursuing in regard to other modes of travel and arteries of commerce, affords an instructive precedent. The Pacific railroads, although private corporations, were subsidized by grants of public land aggregating not less than 197,000,000 acres. The River and Harbor Bill calls for an annual expenditure of thirty or forty millions. If it is worth while to improve the waterways at such vast expense, why should it not be proper to encourage the improvement of highways, especially when half of the cost is to be borne by the localities most immediately concerned?

The cause of civil service reform is encountering some embarrassment resulting from the fact that there is no provision for retiring superannuated employees. The merit system—when it works as it is supposed to work—insures the appointment of only competent persons to positions in the public service. But it does not guarantee that they will stay competent. In particular, it cannot insure their powers against the ravages of old age or give any assurance that their efficiency will remain unimpaired until the very hour and article of death. Under the old spoils system there was little danger of superannuation in the public service. But the merit system at once encounters the old problem—how to secure the efficiency of long experience without falling heir to the inefficiency of enfeebled old age. The crisis has been reached the sooner because in making the appointments on the merit system the preference has been given to veterans of the civil war. Thus many of the departments of the public service have been manned by persons from whom old age was not remote even at the time of their appointment. The army retires its veterans on full pay at sixty-four. But there are no exits from the civil service except voluntary resignation, dismissal for cause, and death. The first is a hard choice when poverty is joined to age. The second is not to be thought of in the case of men who have given faithful service until overtaken by the infirmities of old age. The establishment of civil pensions would remove the difficulty, but our program of military pensions has turned out to be so vastly expensive that there is a strong disinclination to embark in another enterprise of a similar sort. The Civil Service Commission recommends retirement at a fixed age and a plan of compulsory old age insurance, which is virtually a civil pension to be paid at the expense of the remaining employees. Perhaps the solution of the problem will be found along these lines. Two points at least must be guarded: the public service must be efficiently done, and faithful public servants must not be turned out in old age without some financial provision.

We confess to a good deal of sympathy with the demand for the removal of the protective tariff from all articles whose production is controlled by a trust. If competition cannot be found at home, we ought to import some from abroad, and to put trust-made articles on the free list would facilitate this step. A case in point is the paper trust. The business of manufacturing paper for printing purposes is a much bigger one than most persons suppose, but when one pauses to consider the multitude of daily and weekly papers published in this country, and the vast circulation of many of them, it is not difficult to get some impression of the magnitude of the enterprise. All of this business is practically in the hands of a protected trust. A duty of six dollars a ton on wood-pulp effectually excludes foreign competition, while the trust itself disposes of its surplus product in foreign markets at a lower rate than they sell at home. Moreover, the trust has so limited production that there is almost constant danger of a paper famine, which might be precipitated by any change of conditions. Our forests are being sacrificed at an appalling rate to supply the pulp for this trust-made paper, while Canada's limitless supply is unused and unavailable on account of the tariff. Here is an instance in which the most staunch defender of things as they are may well consider whether the "stand pat" policy may not be in the long run the most disturbing and destructive sort of program.

A Federal Question.

In spite of the insistence of Mr. Murphy, the Tammany boss, that the New York delegation to the Democratic nominating convention shall be left uninstructed, it seems increasingly probable that the delegation will be instructed to vote for Judge Alton B. Parker for the presidential nomination. The fact is that Tammany's influence is not nearly so potent in national as in local affairs. There are plenty of New Yorkers who will vote with the Tammany Indians in a municipal election because they expect to get some private advantage from a corrupt administration, yet will own no allegiance to the Big Chief of the tribe when a national question is at issue. So, whether Mr. Murphy's ulterior design was to swing the delegation into line at the last moment for Cleveland or McClelland or Hearst—and all three opinions have been expressed—it now seems pretty sure that the delegation will be instructed for Parker. This is probably wise. The only hope of the Democracy in carrying New York is to play upon the real or supposed hostility of Wall Street and the allied interests toward Mr. Roosevelt. If, on the basis of the Northern Securities case, the President can be represented as a ferocious and irresponsible trust-buster, a more conservative man with no known antipathy to the trusts might have some strength as a candidate. Judge Parker, we believe, has not gone on record on the trust question. He voted for Bryan in the last two elections, which fact will square him with those who consider this the indispensable criterion of party regularity, but will scarcely be reassuring to those eastern financial interests whose support his candidacy is designed to win. However this may be, he is a good man and his nomination would insure a campaign upon a higher plane.

Many people believe that the most hopeful way of bringing Christian union into realization is through Christian common work. Whether this be a correct judgment it is undeniably true that the church is once again speaking with a voice on question of morals and life that is the more authoritative because the more united. A conference was held during the last days of March at St. Barthomew's Parish House in New York City which, including as it did, some of the most prominent church leaders in the United States, will, we believe, prove of very great service in putting a stop to the great prevalence of divorce in our country. Nothing is more important than that ministers and churches as such should put themselves on record by such action as is possible in favor of any movement or agency that is at work for social betterment. The divorce question is admittedly one of the cankers in our body politic. Of the nine states that publish divorce statistics annually only Connecticut seems to be in any degree reducing its divorce rate. It was with a view to discovering what could be done about a more uniform legislation on the subject that the St. Bartholomew conference was called. Ultimately the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That in recognition of the comity which should exist between Christian Churches, it is desirable, and would tend to increase the spirit of Christian unity, for each Church represented in the conference to advise, and if ecclesiastical authority will allow, to enjoin, its ministers to refuse to unite in marriage any person or persons whose marriage the ministers have good reason to believe is forbidden by the laws of the church in which either party seeking to be married holds membership.

No one can well quarrel with such a moderate pronouncement. We all recognize the evils of the present chaotic state of law and public opinion, and if the Church as an organization can do anything by a strong remonstrance to aid subsidiary organizations to fight this great national peril to the family, there should be no wavering.

Ex Governor T. T. Crittenden, himself a Democrat without fear and without reproach, who has served his party and his country well, has written an open letter to Gov. Dockery in which he states some of the elements of the case with remarkable clearness. As a dispassionate and unbiassed statement of the situation by one who has himself occupied the governor's chair at Jefferson City, and who cannot be accused of any desire to "slander Missouri," it is worthy of careful reading. The following is the letter in part:

When you entered the gubernatorial race it was conceded by all thinking men that you would take the chair with clean hands, unembarrassed by pets and rings, with peace prevailing from limit to limit of the state, and, what is better, the good wishes of all classes for the success of the administration. It is now to be regretted by all good Democrats that you did not remain in Congress, where you proved a success, as your administration from the beginning has been, in the estimation of many, a series of blunders and experiments, around which have gathered some as bad men as ever sang songs to a chief or poured words of flattery into a listening ear of an ambitious and weak man. You have not had in the kindness of your heart nerve enough to drive such vultures from the mansion and executive office. These men have remained around you with sycophantic steadiness.

Two unfortunate events during your administration have precipitated the storm upon you, and are subjecting you to the criticism of thousands of your quondam friends. (1) The exposure of boodling by Folk in St. Louis and by your lieutenant governor at Jefferson City. (2) The canvass for the nomination for governor now going on between Joseph W. Folk on the one side, James A. Reed of Kansas City, and Harry Hawes of St. Louis, on the other, with the shrouded ghost of Ed. Butler standing in the rear of Reed and Hawes, directing the course to be pursued by these men and yourself.

Your true nature exhibited itself, first, by your speech at Lone Jack, saying in so many words, "The people were no losers by boodling, only the corporations and outsiders." And the other course you mapped out to follow was the defeat of Mr. Folk for governor by some one of your sympathizers, with Mr. Ed. Butler as a close third. The speech was intended to placate the people, and the defeat of Mr. Folk would prevent further exposure before more serious errors were charged and proven against your administration.

You made grievous errors in both courses, the first in morals, the second in seeking to protect as base a set of scoundrels as ever "cut a throat or scuttled a ship." Would it not be more commendable in the governor of a great state to further the ends of justice by aiding the law officers in the exposure of crime, in the convictions of the criminals, than seeking to defeat the only man of the three—Reed, Hawes and Folk—who is honest and bold enough to declare what his purpose is now and what it will be if elected governor?

You have made your bed, chosen your associates—Reed, Hawes and Butler—and you must lie in it. You must survive or perish with Reed, Hawes and Butler before the nominating convention. With them you have joined your destiny and with them you must stand or fall.

Commander Booth-Tucker is sponsor for a Bill that deserves the consideration and, we believe, the approbation in its main principles, of every Congressman and Senator. "Give every man who wants it a chance to get a home in the land," says President Roosevelt. And if we go back to our first president we find George Washington expressing his belief that "agriculture is the most beautiful, most useful and most noble employment of man." "Back to the land" has for some years been a cry, but nothing more than a hopeless cry for many a man who would be glad of the chance to convert the desert into the garden, if he had the opportunity to earn an honorable living. In essence Commander Booth-Tucker's proposal is a government advance to bona fide settlers of from $500 to $1,500 in cash or material, for the purpose of enabling worthy but poor families to make homes for themselves upon the land. For this purpose he proposes the issue of 3 per cent fifty year gold bonds to the amount of $50,000,000, not more than $5,000,000 to be issued per year. With these resources farms are to be provided, not exceeding forty acres irrigated or eighty acres non-irrigated land, which are to be paid for in easy installments. Such a scheme, properly safe-guarded, would help many an unfortunate man to become a reputable citizen and prevent many a speculator, dummy-homesteader and land grabber from getting rich by the present easily evaded homestead laws of the government.

The House Judiciary Committee has unanimously agreed to report the Hepburn-Dolliver bill with an amendment which, in view of legal decisions already rendered, it would perhaps be wisest at present to accept, seeing that a unanimous report from the committee will do much to insure the passage of the bill. The amendment is to insert a clause that shall prevent interference with bona fide shipments for personal use and not for sale.

"Consolidating the Churches."

Under the above title Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis contributes an article to Everybody's Magazine for April. Dr. Hillis points out very forcibly the economic advantages of union and co-operation among the churches, just as we see it in the industrial world, and he also states some of the evil results of denominational rivalry. It is not difficult to do either one of these two things; but he who would promote Christian union to-day must do something far more difficult than that. The question of our denominationalism must be studied in the light of history, and there must be an earnest effort to understand the real points of difference that keep the various denominations apart. It is not enough to point out the economic advantage of the eight or ten churches in a small town co-operating or uniting as one church. Unless these churches are made to see how this can be done without the sacrifice of truth or of conscience, they will continue to maintain their separate denominational existence, and starve if need be. The element of conscience cannot be ignored in the treatment of this question. Better divisions, even, with all their waste and narrow provincialism, than a union purchased at the sacrifice of a good conscience or by the surrender of honest convictions of truth.

How may the church of Christ be united? It is hardly definite enough to say, with Dr. Hillis, that church unity among Protestants "on the basis of the great simplicities of Christianity, is not only possible but practical and easy of achievement." What are "the great simplicities of Christianity?" The Disciples of Christ furnish a very definite answer to this question. Their plan of union is to return to the New Testament basis of the church and terms of membership. As to what these are, the earnest reader can hardly go amiss. In the earliest and the only inspired church history—the Acts of the Apostles—there is a record of what men were required to believe and do in order obtain admission into the church of Christ. They were required to believe on Christ, repent of their sins, confess Him with the mouth and in the act of baptism, and then strive to live according to Christ's teaching. There were no human creeds formulated, no party names worn, and no ecclesiasticism, binding men where Christ has left them free. They were one in Christ.

Is it impossible or impracticable to return to that simple order of things? We do not think so. We believe the tendency is in that direction. And yet we do not underestimate the tremendous obstacles that are in the way, and that must be overcome. Denominational pride and jealousy, the dogmatism of those who mistake their opinions for divine revelations, the ardent supporter of sectism who es-teems his party shibboleths more highly than he does the fulfillment of Christ's prayer for unity—these are some of the difficulties that lie in the way. But let us not doubt the power of Christ to overcome such obstacles, and to lift us, in due time, into the larger and fuller life, where all our differences will disappear in the unity of the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God.

Change in Assistant Editorship.

In harmony with the brief editorial mention recently, the reader will observe the name of Paul Moore substituted for that of W. E. Garrison in our editorial staff, as Assistant Editor. Concerning the retiring Assistant Editor, who has resigned his position to accept the presidency of Butler College at Irvington, Ind., it is not necessary, nor would it be in good taste, perhaps, for us to say very much. It will readily be understood, however, that his departure to another field of labor, which has been pending for several months, has not been acquiesced in by us without the deepest sense of personal loss. His perfect oneness of mind with us on all the great questions of our day, his high ideal of journalism, and his sincere devotion to the principles of religious reformation for which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST stands, made our work together a constant delight. He felt it to be his duty, however, to respond to this call from Butler College, an institution which, because of its central location, its splendid plant, its financial strength and its excellent corps of teachers, has the opportunity of widest usefulness. We have not sought to dissuade him from that conviction. We are glad to announce that he will continue to do a part of the literary work he has been doing for the paper. We feel sure, too, that should the exigencies of the future require his return to the paper, the same sense of duty that causes him to leave it for the present, may be relied upon to bring him back to it.

Concerning his successor, whose picture we printed last week, we may speak more freely. We have known Paul Moore almost from his childhood; and have always loved him for the purity of his life, his modest demeanor and his many admirable qualities. His opportunities for intellectual training, his love for our cause inherited from parents and grandparents, and made vital by his own study and investigation, together with his experience and training in religious journalism, point him out as a most suitable person for the position to which we have called him. The Christian Century, with which Brother Moore has been connected for some months, referring to his connection with this paper, has an editorial notice of him by Bro. C. A. Young, from which we make the following extract:

When W. T. Moore went to England in 1878 he took his entire family, Mrs. Moore, whose father, R. M. Bishop, was governor of Ohio, Paul, Mary, Richard and Landon. Paul was educated in the universities of London and Paris, and for ten years before he returned to America in 1891, was associated with The London Commonwealth, founded by his father. The Christian Commonwealth took rank with The Christian World and The British Weekly. After Bro. W. T. Moore returned to America Paul Moore was the editor and manager of The Christian Commonwealth, and only gave up this great work because of failing health. Bro. Paul has never been robust, but has unusual powers of endurance. As a man he is brave, but gentle, and the qualities of his refined Christian character enter largely into his editorial work. He is a charming companion and the soul of honor. We shall greatly miss him in Chicago, but we bid him Godspeed.

Since the change in assistant editors had to be made, we feel we have been fortunate in securing one whom we have known so long, who is in every way congenial, and whose large experience in newspaper work will enable him to be very useful to the paper. It is believed that with the continued work of the retiring Assistant Editor, and the entire time of so experienced a journalist as the present Assistant Editor, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will not only suffer no loss from the change, but will perhaps be even better equipped for its great and continually increasing work.

Ministers and Business Speculations.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON: Valuing your opinion and knowing your ability to express it, I write to ask concerning the present tendency, seemingly, for so many of our preachers to go into questionable avocations, such as "wild cat" speculations in oil lands, mining industries, saw mills, patent gates, patent medicines, etc. The question, however, arises, Why should ministers of the gospel either be in such a condition as to make it necessary to enter into secular vocations to supplement their salaries, or what are the psychological conditions that make them desire to do any other work than to preach the gospel? Is it because we fail to pay our preachers a living salary? Is it because of the worldliness of the preacher? Or is it because of the lack of preparation for his work? A brief article from your pen in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, I believe, would be read with interest. Very sincerely yours,

Des Moines, Ia.

JOEL BROWN.

There can be no question, we think, that there is what our brother calls, a "tendency" at the present time for preachers to turn away from the ministry to business pursuits, and often to speculative and questionable schemes of money-making. If this tendency is more pronounced than it has been in the past—and we fear it is—it is probably the result of the commercialism of the times, or the desire to increase one's wealth, which is so marked a feature of our day. Preachers are but human beings, after all, and they share more or less in the spirit of the times.

There ought to be a clear discrimination, however, between those ministers who, failing to find a support for themselves by giving themselves wholly to the ministry, turn to some honorable business by which they may supplement their income and maintain themselves and their families with self-respect, and another class who, having the ability to earn a sufficient support for themselves and their families in the work of the ministry, turn to questionable get-rich-quick schemes in order to amass wealth. For the first, we have no word of condemnation or censure. Paul himself turned to tent-making to support himself when the work of the gospel did not support him, preaching, meanwhile, as he had opportunity. It is a truth which we must recognize, that many good men fail to earn a support for themselves and their families in the work of the ministry. Whether it be their own fault, or the fault of the churches—and probably the blame should be divided—the fact remains and must be recognized in any fair consideration of this question. When it becomes necessary to engage in what is known as a secular calling to earn honest self-support, the preacher should set a good example, at least, by engaging in such calling as is above reproach and as meets some legitimate want of the people. We cannot resist the conviction, however, that the churches are in some degree responsible for good men turning to secular pursuits. They should not expect the preacher, alone, to illustrate the law of sacrifice.

The evil to which attention is called, and which deserves the most serious consideration, is the turning away of so many preachers from their holy calling to engage in some speculation which promises large and immediate returns, and to lend their influence as ministers of the gospel to further these doubtful enterprises. For that condition of things there are at least two causes. The first is the inordinate desire to be rich, on the part of the preachers, which renders them, as it does others, too indifferent as to the means of gratifying that desire. And second, the lack of proper appreciation of the sacredness and supreme value of the work of the ministry. It is to be feared that too many men enter the work of the ministry without a searching examination of the motives which prompt them, and without any proper understanding of the nature of the obligations which they assume in entering upon this work.

If we are right in our diagnosis of the causes which are leading our ministers and others to neglect the preaching of the word, or mar their influence as preachers, by engaging in business speculations, the remedy is obvious enough. The Bible teaching as to the perils of those who would be rich, and the responsibility of those who are rich, must be emphasized anew until men shall understand more clearly the relation between property and the kingdom of God; and then young men who are preparing for the ministry in our colleges must be taught that the work of the Christian ministry is the highest work that any man can do in this world, and that to turn away from it or neglect it for the sake of increasing one's wealth, is to choose the less instead of the greater good, and to be unfaithful to a sacred trust. In a little while it will matter little whether we have been rich or poor in this world, but all through eternity it will matter much whether we have been faithful in the use of the talents or ability or advantages which God has given us. In other words, we mean to say that the thoroughly trained and consecrated minister is not likely to use his holy calling for merely personal gain or selfish aggrandizement.

Questions and Answers.

1. Was Alexander Campbell ever a member of the Baptist Church? 2. If so, was he ever excluded, and on what charge? 3. Did he not belong to the Presbyterian Church and leave it of his own accord? 4. Was he ever immersed?
V. J. McCOMB.
Pine Bluff, Ark.

These questions may all be answered in a brief statement. Alexander Campbell and his father, Thomas Campbell, were connected with the Seceders' Branch of the Presbyterian Church, and were such when they began their reformatory work. After much investigation of the New Testament they reached the conclusion that immersion in water of a penitent believer was the only New Testament baptism. As soon as this conclusion was reached, the Campbells and their associates were baptized on a simple confession of their faith in Christ, by Elder Mathias Luce, a Baptist minister. This was in June, 1812. Now that the Brush Run Church, composed of baptized believers, found itself standing alone, it seemed desirable that they should form a connection with the Red Stone Baptist Association, and this they did, stipulating, however, that they must be received without consenting to any creed beyond the Bible. This union continued for fifteen years, and was fruitful of good results. Eventually it became apparent, however, that the Campbells and their associates held views concerning the relation of the law and the gospel, the nature of conversion, the subject of creeds, etc., which the Baptists did not approve, and there was no little opposition to the work of the reformers. A union was then entered into with the Mahoning Association, where more liberal views prevailed, and this Association, later, went wholly into the reformation with Mr. Campbell. We recently heard an eminent Baptist minister state publicly that it was one of the great mistakes of Baptist history that they did not find room enough for Alexander Campbell and his co-laborers in their fellowship.

I think I am beginning at last to understand your position on Church federation. If so, you favor co-operation with other religious bodies, only so far as consistent with our position and conscience, and that for the sole purpose of promoting the union for which we plead. Was not this not the meaning of your Omaha resolution?

ALPHA.

Certainly, the meaning of the resolution was that we should co-operate with others only so far as we could do so, consistently with our position, as advocates of Christian union on the New Testament basis. But promoting a more perfect union, was not the "sole purpose" of such co-operation, but one purpose; another was, the actual good that could be accomplished in behalf of civic righteousness, temperance and in caring for the religiously destitute by such co-operation. Our brother is not the only one that is beginning to see that subject in a new light. A quiet revolution of feeling is going on among us, as we are coming to understand what is meant by federation, and that it is a step towards Christian union which we cannot ignore and be true to our plea.

Editor's Easy Chair.

A week at the desk to-day since returning from Florida, but we can almost hear the notes of the mocking bird and feel on our brow the soft, languid air of the southland. It was interesting to note in our railway travel north the rapid change in the progress of vegetation from semi-tropical Florida to St. Louis. It seemed July on Biscayne Bay, June at Jacksonville, May through Alabama, late in April through Tennessee, and March through Illinois. We are glad to report that "spring is on her way," with her wealth of blossom and foliage and fragrance, but she could not keep pace with the locomotive. Nature is in no hurry. Her law is "first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." The Master said the kingdom of heaven was like that. Sometimes we would like to have it like dynamite, to blow up the empire of Satan; but this is not God's method, either in nature or grace. Without the sound of a trumpet, or the beat of drum, or the shout of the victor, spring is moving steadily, quietly and victoriously northward, with her many-colored banners, filling the air with the fragrance of her flowers and the music of her birds; carpeting the earth in green, and clothing the trees with delicate foliage, and beautifying the roughest and most uncomely places by the touch of her magic wand. We shall feel, as she advances to our present latitude, that we have experienced for a second time the delights of the gentle springtime.

We find St. Louis more than busy in its preparation for the World's Fair. The landlords are especially busy in raising rents, and the demand for houses is greater than the supply. We took a walk over the World's Fair grounds this morning. Vast progress has been made within the past two months, and yet there remains much to be done during the present month to get ready for the opening. One is simply bewildered, by a casual visit, at the marvelous structures towering on every hand, and at the prodigal expenditure of money, of labor, of skill and energy for the instruction and entertainment of the world. Art, science, commerce, industry, invention, education, antiquities, and all that relates to material progress of the world is there exhibited. Religion is about the only great commanding interest that has no representation under the auspices and patronage of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition authorities. There is, however, an interesting and little pavilion going up on the hill on one of the great thoroughfares, that will attract considerable attention because its character, purpose and designation will be so different from everything else about it. We refer to the pavilion of the Disciples of Christ, now assuming form. It is under roof and will soon be finished if the funds are forthcoming. It will be highly appreciated by the Disciples who visit the World's Fair and make it their rendezvous, their resting-place when weary, and a meeting place of friends. Thousands of people will pass by it every day, many of whom will learn for the first time of the existence of such a body, and we should see to it that they learn something also of its meaning and mission.

It is not without a heavy cost to itself in many ways that a city becomes the focus of the world's attention, and the objective point of the world's visitation. St. Louis is now in the white light that beats upon a world's fair city, and how it is straightened until the trial be overpast! As coming events cast their shadows before, we are already having a foretaste of what is ahead of us, in the crowded thoroughfares, stores and street cars, in the increased expense of living; in the rush and tumult of preparation, and in the general frustration of all ordinary plans for the summer. It will be a magnificent spectacle, no doubt—the wonderful structures, the marvelous exhibits and the intermingling of all the nationalities of earth as they tramp through the broad thoroughfares of the magic Ivory City. Except, however, for the duty of hospitality to the friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who will call at the office, we would, after a few weeks' experience, gladly run away from all the pomp and glory and splendid pageantry of the world's procession, and of the great show itself, and go to the woods, where we could hear the song of birds and the music of the whispering trees, and watch the young leaves play, or look upon the silent procession of the clouds floating in the distant blue, or marshalled about the gates of the morning and the evening, to catch the glory of the rising and setting sun. The reader need not be surprised, therefore, to learn any time after the first month of the Fair is passed, that we are discharging the duty of hospitality by proxy and have fled to the mountains or to the woods and lake-side of Michigan. Not that we love art less, but nature more!

It should be remembered by our members everywhere that our National Convention meets in St. Louis, October 13 20, and unless they expect to visit St. Louis more than once during the Fair, they should postpone their visit until October, taking in the Fair either before or after the Convention. It will doubtless be the greatest gathering of the brotherhood that has ever convened in our history, if the conditions continue favorable, and it will be a competitive attraction with the World's Fair, with many, to meet the representative men and women of our movement in the largest gathering in its history. No doubt there will be thousands visiting St. Louis at different times during the summer who will make our pavilion on the hill their headquarters, but we expect by far the largest number of our members who will be able to make but one visit, to make that in October. It is the finest month of the whole year in this latitude, and there will be the triple attraction of ideal weather, seeing the Fair at its best, and attending our great National Convention to be held in the Music Hall and Coliseum, between the dates mentioned above. Nothing is being omitted that can be done by the churches in St. Louis to make that gathering of Disciples historic, not only in numbers, but in all that goes to make up a great religious convention. One of the most essential conditions of making that a great convention, is that the May offering for home missions shall excel by far any previous offering for that work. Let us see to it that this condition is not neglected.

Notes and Comments.

The Herald and Presbyter (Presbyterian) says of the Religious Education Association that "it antagonizes the International Sunday-school Association and the international lessons," and refers, with evident sympathy and approval, to the alleged fact that the leaders in the actual work of the churches are holding aloof from it because it "is committed to destructive liberalism." In this connection it is interesting to note the comment of Amos R. Wells, managing editor of the Christian Endeavor World. Mr. Wells is thoroughly committed to the international Sunday-school work and to a soundly conservative evangelical theology. He attended the recent convention of the Religious Education Association at Philadelphia, and says: "I could discover no animus against the International Sunday-school movement, and I heard no utterances leaning toward the modern destructive criticism of the Bible."

There appeared in the daily papers on Wednesday of last week, a most notable contribution to the literature of the present political campaign in Missouri, in the form of an appeal, signed by more than forty prominent ministers in the city, representing all the leading religious bodies, in behalf of civic righteousness and of honest government. There is no question but that the recent occurrences in connection with the primary election held in this city have aroused the citizens of St. Louis to such a realization of political degeneracy and debauchery of the ballot box as they have never had before. We have evidently reached a crisis in political affairs in the state of Missouri. Never in the history of any state has there been so clear-cut an issue as that which now exists in the present gubernatorial campaign in Missouri. There is absolutely no excuse or apology to be made for men who take their stand deliberately with thieves and thugs, who outrage decency and trample upon the rights of citizens to carry out their dishonest purposes. When the returns are in from the pending election, we shall have a revelation, such as we have never had before, of the real character of the citizenship in Missouri, unless, perchance, the voice of the people shall be stifled at the ballot box.

A few weeks since, the editor, on his way down town to the office, in a street car, entered into conversation with a lawyer and local politician concerning the present condition of things in our city and state, and expressed his surprise that a business man of some repute in the city should have presided at a meeting favoring one of the candidates for governor. Whereupon the local politician and lawyer, with a better insight into the motives which prompt a certain class of men in their political action, said it was very natural that he should have done so, and that we would find that many of the great corporations of the city and state were in favor of the machine candidates as against any honest man for governor, because it was cheaper for them to purchase immunity from taxation from the machine, than to pay their honest taxes. "But," we replied in our innocence, "if the people of the state come to know that fact, they will smash the machine!" "Ah!" said our friend, "but the machine will see to it that they do not know about it, or at least that they do not believe it!" We mention the incident as one worthy of being pondered by the honest people of the country. Is it possible that respectable men, connected with great corporations, favor corrupt political methods because it is cheaper than to pay their honest taxes?

In these days of materialism run mad, and of leaning upon the almighty dollar rather than upon the Almighty God, it is a sort of spiritual tonic to read Dr. Pierson's "George Muller, of Bristol." An autobiography is what every biography "ought to be," and so this work is founded upon Mr. Muller's "Narrative of the Lord's Dealings" in five volumes. This man, who deserves a place in that muster roll of the saints, Heb. 11, is simply an example of great faith—no miracle-worker, but a believer who with the key of faith unlocked God's mysteries and with the key of prayer unlocked God's treasures, giving the world a demonstration of the fact that "He is, and is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him."

Muller, a native of Kroppenstaedt, Prussia, was born Sept. 27, 1805. His early years gave no promise of usefulness or piety. He was a skilled liar and thief. Before he was ten years of age he was an expert in these vices. Curiously enough, his father set him apart to the ministry. The night his mother lay dying he was drunk on the streets, and when he met the clergyman for the customary "confession of sin" before his confirmation, he defrauded him out of eleven-twelfths of the confirmation fee entrusted to him by his father! At sixteen he was an accomplished criminal, a companion of convicted felons, and himself in a felon's cell. Yet he was accepted as a candidate for holy orders with permission to preach in the Lutheran establishment! After a score of years of evil-doing, he was converted in a prayer-meeting while a student at Halle. Then he came under the influence of Dr. Tholuck, who about this time became professor of divinity in the university. In 1826 he first attempted to preach, memorized another man's sermon and recited it, but asked to speak the second time, and having no second sermon committed to memory, he resolved to depend on the Lord for help, and expounded the fifth of Matthew, thus discovering, as he felt, the true way to preach. He felt led to give himself to the work of missions, and in February, 1829, left for London and offered himself to the London Society. He wanted to serve "without salary and laboring when and where the Lord seemed to direct," but they felt it inexpedient to employ those who were unwilling to submit to their guidance with respect to missionary operations, and providence led him to Teignmouth where he served a little church of eighteen members, at a salary of $275. This was in 1830. About this time he heard some Christian women talking on the subject of "believer's baptism." When he was asked his opinion, he replied, having been baptized as a child, he saw no need of being baptized again. One said, "Have you ever yet prayerfully searched the Word of God as to its testimony in this matter?" He said he had not. "I entreat you, then," said she, "never again to speak any more about it till you have done so." He determined to examine the Word. Two passages convinced him, Acts 8:36-38, that baptism is proper only as the act of a believer confessing Christ, and Romans 6:3-5, that only immersion in water can express the typical burial with Christ and resurrection with him there and elsewhere made so prominent. Conviction compelled action. Later he said, "Of all revealed truths, not one is more clearly revealed in the Scriptures—not even the doctrine of justification by faith—and the subject has only become obscured by men not having been willing to take the Scriptures alone to decide the point."

During the same summer of 1830, further study of the Word satisfied him that though there is no direct command to do so, the scriptural and apostolic practice was to break bread every Lord's day. Acts 22:7. He also became convinced that he should receive no stated salary as a minister of Christ. At the same time he urged voluntary offerings as the proper acknowledgment of service rendered by God's minister, and had a box put up in the chapel for the offerings. From that time on he resolved to ask no help from man, but to trust to the Great Provider. "Confidence in God" was his supreme secret. He believed; believing, he prayed; and praying, he expected; and expecting, he received. "Not once," he said, "or five times, or five hundred times, but thousands of times in these three score years, have we had in hand not enough for one more meal, either in food or in funds; but not once has God failed us; not once have we or the orphans gone hungry or lacked any good thing."

April, 1832, marks a new turning point in the life of this marvelous man. His work in Bristol begins, and for sixty-six years Bristol is his field of labor and must be ever linked with his name. Bethesda Chapel is the center of his new parish, but the call is beyond that of a simple pastorate. August H. Francke was a fellow countryman of Muller, who in 1696 at Halle, in Prussia, had begun the largest enterprise for poor children in the world at that time. For two hundred years those Orphan Houses have served their holy purpose, and thousands of poor children have been housed, fed, clothed and taught. Here Muller had in 1827 for two months availed himself of the free lodgings furnished poor divinity students and taken, no doubt, the pattern and suggestion of his work. He resolved to conduct his orphanages as he had his church, trusting in the Lord alone for temporal supplies. During the four years he had been looking alone to the Lord he had received the first year, $650; the second, $755; the third, $975, and the fourth, $1,335—all in free will offerings and without ever asking a human being for a penny. "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it," was one of his life mottoes. He would apply this Scripture to his new plan. The first gift was a shilling, then furniture, then $500 from a poor needle-woman. In April, 1836, the first Orphanage was opened in a hired house. By the close of 1837 three were opened with eighty-one children and nine helpers, "and the Lord had furnished $1,335 for temporal supplies."

"A Father to the fatherless," was a phrase that deeply moved this man as he read his Bible on his knees. Trials came. Sometimes the money supply ran so low that it was needful the Lord should give by the day and almost by the hour if the needs were met. One day a gentleman and some ladies visited the orphan houses and saw the large number of little ones to be cared for. "Of course you can't carry on these institutions without a good stock of funds," said one of the ladies. "Have you a good stock?" asked the gentleman. "Our funds are deposited in a bank that cannot break," was the quiet answer. The gentleman drew out twenty-five dollars, a donation that was most timely, as there was not one penny then in hand. "Jehovah jireh" was the name of Muller's God—"the Lord will provide." One day in March, '42, it was necessary "to delay dinner for about half an hour because of lack of supplies," but supplies came. Sept. 4, '44, at day dawn, but one farthing was left on hand, and one hundred and forty mouths were to be fed at breakfast! For any and all needs help was always given, and it never once came too late.

In '48 began the work of erecting the new Orphan House on Ashley Down. Then the second in '57, then the third, fourth, fifth. By 1870 five large buildings with accommodations for two thousand children and their teachers and assistants, and all built on the simple lines of faith and prayer. Then came his extensive missionary tours from 1875 to 1892. From his seventieth to his eighty-seventh year, when most men feel it proper to withdraw from all activities, he traveled in forty-two countries, over two hundred thousand miles, speaking to over three millions of people in between five and six thousand addresses. Yet he made no appeals for funds. I heard him when on his fourth tour in 1897. He spoke a number of times in Washington. It was interesting to study his simple style, to observe his great humility, to note the directness, the scripturalness and the unaffected and childlike character of his talks with God. He had

By Judge A. E. Wilkinson

In nothing does the wisdom of the founder of the Christian religion appear more striking and profound, when tested by the result, than in the teachings as to the relations of his followers to the civil powers. That the tendency of his principles was essentially socialistic, seems clear. It is impossible for one to become fully imbued with the feeling of the brotherhood and equality of all men, without, at the same time, cherishing at least a dream and hope that some day the organized frame of government and society shall come to represent and protect that brotherhood and equality. But, whatever its ultimate tendencies may be, it is clear that his teaching sought no immediate or revolutionary supplanting of existing institutions. It is true that on one occasion he said to the rich young ruler who inquired the way to eternal life that he must sell all he had and give it to the poor. But this was obviously a direction judged to be necessary for meeting the particular case, and not a general rule. Men of wealth and position, like Joseph of Arimathea, were numbered among his adherents and seem to have retained their worldly possessions without any demand for the application of such a sweeping requirement. In the first enthusiasm of the new religion, a group of his followers seem to have attempted a socialistic experiment by throwing all property into a common stock. But it is evident that this was no general rule in the infant church, nor have we any account of the results of the experiment nor warrant for regarding it as the model to which the relations of Christians generally were to be conformed. Much less is there any cause for believing that either Christ or any of his earliest followers thought of any such reconstruction of the social fabric as should establish socialism by law over anyone, willing or unwilling.

Radical as his views on brotherhood and equality were, his teachings and those of his followers, as gathered from the New Testament, upon the subject of the relations of Christians to the state, were remarkable for their conservatism, and not for any tendency to revolution. And this is evidently not accidental, but a deliberate choice of a position which shocked the patriotism and disappointed the hopes of those who looked for the triumph of the Messiah. Thus in the case of the tribute money, which was an issue forced upon him as typical of the whole relation which he was to take to the Roman government, his decision in favor of submission to the civil powers was prompt and clear. That a dominion such as he claimed and has exercised over the minds and hearts of men could be held without conflict with legitimate government or law, was one of the things which then looked impossible, but in which history has justified his position.

A similar apparent inconsistency but real harmony appears in his dealing with the question of war. Nothing could be more opposed to his teachings or spirit. In nothing are the hearts of his true followers more concerned than that war should cease from the earth. As to their personal relations, both among themselves and with others, the principles of non-resistance, forgiveness, and meekness which he taught are such that the church to-day is ages from accepting and living them. But there is no evidence that he ever thought to do away with the obligation of military service from the citizen to the state. The highest eulogy he ever pronounced upon the faith of any disciples was upon that displayed by a professional soldier in the armies of Rome. Soldiers were early numbered among the converts to the new religion; nor is there any intimation that they were required to abandon their calling, or that their trade, bloody and hateful though it might be, was inconsistent with the Christian life. The centurion remained a soldier when he became a Christian? He only became a better soldier, less reckless and cruel, more disciplined, orderly and obedient. So the publican remained a tax gatherer; but he became a just and honest official instead of an oppressive and avaricious one.

The attitude of the Church towards the state, in its civil and military demands, was one of alliance and not of hostility, so far at least as the state concerned itself with its legitimate business—the preservation of social stability. When the powers of government sought to exercise dominion over the realm which Christ claimed for his own—the human soul and its relations with God—there, indeed, subjection ceased. But even then there was no warrant for opposing the civil power with its own weapons, or with any force but the passive non-resistance which refused to sacrifice conscience to the decree of power. The position of the church in these matters seems to have been clear and consistent up to the time that the civil power fell into its own hands. That the rulers who then bore the name of Christ should fail to recognize that the same principle which denied dominion over conscience to the heathen ruler denied it equally to the professed or even to the sincere Christian, was natural enough—inevitable for the time being—but the truth, once implanted, germinated and grew. Through ages of darkness and blood its silent influence spread until religious liberty became the accepted rule of the enlightened world. Looking back over the wretched struggle we can now see that, however often mistaken zeal has allied religion with despotism, the true spirit of Christianity has been at the bottom of all the chief force at work for freedom. Thus religion has proved itself, through ages, to be at once the most revolutionary and the most conservative force at work in society.

It needs the experience of centuries in the practical application of Christ's methods for the advancement of his kingdom to enable us to really believe that it is possible to succeed in that way. Even now the lesson is imperfectly learned. It is still, perhaps, impossible for most Christians to understand that it is the duty of the church to lend its aid to the civil government—to be, in fact, its chiefest foundation and support—and, at the same time, though able to direct and control the forces of that government, to ask nothing from it, nor employ them in any way for the advancement of Christianity—to give all and to accept nothing in return but to be let alone.

And if it is hard for us now to realize the strength of this position, how impossible was it for his followers at the time the position was first defined by the Master. Their amazement, their incredulity, their stubborn conviction that his oft-repeated teaching on this subject and explanation of the true character of his mission could not be meant literally, are patent throughout the narrative. Their state of mind is reflected in their last recorded appeal to the Savior, "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" The extent of their misunderstanding is measured by the depths of their despair when forced to believe that the success of his kingdom by the civil supremacy, to which they looked, was no longer possible. It is then that the stoutest of his disciples abandons hope, turns from what he regards as a ruined cause, and leads the disciples back to Galilee to resume the life of fishermen.

What a contrast this, which was in truth the only human, sensible, and rational view of a situation, to that held by the Master. Here, where others saw defeat, he alone could perceive victory. No note of misgiving rings through the sorrows and agonies of his last hours. His last words, as he hung upon the cross, betrayed, abandoned, and in the tortures of dissolution, spoke not of defeat but of triumph. "It is finished." Sublime proclamation of victory! Victory out of defeat! Mad delusion of a visionary fanatic, if the event shall disappoint so wild, so absurd a prophecy! Calm vision of one more than man, if this mad dream can ever, in truth, prove to be a sober reality!

The means by which Jesus proposed to accomplish his objects seem the more eccentric and astonishing when we force ourselves to realize how enormous was the task to which they were Past.

In or near the year 1540, a gold and soul-seeking Spanish priest stood upon the crest of a low mountain and looked down upon one of the Zuni pueblos of what is now northwestern New Mexico. The blazing sun shone through the clear air upon the whitish-grey terraced structure below him, and straightway the expectant imagination of this wandering priest hailed the scene as that of the sought-for golden cities of Cibola. The priest returned to Mexico with the story that at last he

The pueblos are the remains of huge apartment houses, terraced, many storied, the inhabitants, whoever they were, reaching their quarters by means of temporary ladders. They were built of the inevitable dried brick stuff, and would often house a whole tribe. They represent a social organization far in advance of the Indian. The cliff-dwellings are either excavations in the

How great affairs do hang upon the character of their beginnings! If an Anglo-Saxon, instead of Coronado of the Latin race, had led the first exploring party into this southwest, a different story might be told of the past progress of the country. But, as it is, the Mexican is being rapidly dis-had beheld the fabled seven cities, and an expedition started northward, under Coronado, to reach the cities and wrest its storied wealth from its aboriginal owners.

The record of Coronado's quest is laid among the archives in old Santa Fe, and around this old record is being gathered many another fact concerning the ancient things of the Colorado and Rio Grande valleys, things of an unknown past even stranger than those dreamed of the unfound Eldorados.

Mystery draws men. Of the cliff-dwellers and pueblo people of New Mexico and Arizona it may be said that they are an enigma compared with which the archeological problems of

The archeologist and anthropologist have long been here, but they have been able to form almost no conception of the personal characteristics, language, habits or religion of these ancient people. The remains of irrigation canals as perfect as any our good government may soon hope to build are found here and there, but before all we stand dumb as the mute monuments of that rich and storied past. Whole epochs of the doings of human kind are not dreamed of in all our histories. From whence did these people come? When and how did they perish, and what was their mission under God? placed—pushed back into the small valleys and out of the way. The land that is now to be possessed by the soldiers of Gideon is a land soon to be a great land. New Mexico is three times the size of Kentucky, and the native gama grass is even better than blue grass for winter pasture for stock. And startling also as it may seem to my reader, not "scrub" cattle, but blooded Herefords are grown on these plains. New Mexico has about 300,000 population, and Arizona nearly as many. Fifteen states the size of Massachusetts could be made of the former territory, and two states the size of New York could be laid off in the eastern and southern parts with land enough left in the northwestern corner to make twenty-four Rhode Islands. New Mexico has twenty-five towns of over three thousand population each. Many of these are almost cities, modern and much more up-to-date than towns of the same size east of the Mississippi. Here is a crossing of the nation's great traffic ways. Four transcontinental lines of railway, leading from Chicago to the City of Mexico and the Pacific Coast, and from the Pacific Coast to the Gulf ports and the east, all find a point of contact and divergence in the Rio Grande valley. Five lines of railroad have been built in the past two years, and others are projected. The government is about to

The Surgeon's Assistant in a Dangerous Case.

The surgeon who is attending a dangerous case praises the food that helped his little patient.

"I have a story to tell about what Grape-Nuts did and is still doing for my child, a story marvelous indeed which seems almost incredible but which is an absolute fact.

"Two years ago in March my little four-year-old daughter was stricken down with Tuberculosis of the right hip joint. We put her in charge of a specialist for treatment. He told us that our only hope of saving her hip and perhaps her life in addition to his surgical treatment was to build up her system with good nourishing food to make good rich blood, bone, muscle and fat which in time would cure the disease by absorption.

"This sounded easy but proved a difficult case to treat as there were so many foods recommended that did not agree with her or that she did not like and therefore would not eat.

"For a year and a half she barely held her own until Grape-Nuts was tried which she liked from the first and in two months gained two pounds in weight where during the 18 months preceding she had lost weight.

"Now notwithstanding she is also just recovering from a severe attack of the whooping cough which she has had for the last three months, she has gained steadily in weight, is growing nicely and her entire recovery is promising and hopeful and we are confident of complete success.

"Our surgeon is delighted with the rapid improvement she is making and both he and ourselves are more than thankful that we tried Grape-Nuts."

The writer of this letter is the Pastor of a church at Warrensville, Ohio. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Thousands of physicians now prescribe Grape-Nuts food in all cases where strength is expected from food. "There's a reason."

construct a number of irrigation reservoirs. In the Pecos valley alone, from which I write, there is a most beautiful and rich country already subject to irrigation, in size twice that of one of the sovereign states of our Union. For apples this valley out-rivals the famous Ozarks, while its alfalfa and other products are superb. And who has not heard of Phoenix the Beautiful, in the whilom salt desert, where W. H. Bagby ministers? And be it known that the resources, mineral as well as other, are just in the mere beginning of development. It is well-known that the section is pre-eminently the lung sanitarium of America. Medical experts located the United States naval and military hospital for consumptives under the brow of Mt. Capitan. Albuquerque equals Colorado Springs as a tuberculosis cure. As business centers, El Paso will rival Denver, and Phoenix Salt Lake City.

The territories have splendid school systems, liberally supported and well manned. New Mexico has a full line of state institutions doing good work. Two classes of people come hither:

came into the kingdom for such a time and such a land as this. The very air breathes the Disciple spirit. The lines of mountain, river, railroad line, coal mine and irrigation canal if put together would spell with giant and inviting letters the great word OPPORTUNITY. The Presbyterians think something of the future of the territory. Last year they spent here $270,000 of mission money. Other denominations think after the same fashion. Until three months ago there were only five of our church organizations in all this vast region from the orange groves of California to the Texas border. One of these, Roswell, is now self-supporting. In the writer's judgment, there is no other locality under the Stars and Stripes that would yield quite so large returns in proportion to the amount of mission money expended. The field is indeed virgin. As I write to-night, there are only two preachers of the greatest religious movement of modern times giving their time to the Word in all this region of an empire's extent and promise. "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest."

The Grandest Society on Earth

One Hundred Years of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

By William Durban

By far the greatest event of this week in England is the Centenary Celebration of the establishment of the British and Foreign Bible Society. I have at times taken some of our esteemed American brethren, visiting the Old Country, to see the worthiest scenes of London. One spot hallowed to all Christian hearts in England is the Bible Society's House on the Thames Embankment, in Queen Victoria Street. The most inviting section of this building is the Museum. Here we are shown the famous "Little Mary Jones's Bible." The tale connected with this precious volume is a very pathetic one. Mary Jones was a poor Welsh girl who tramped many miles over the Welsh hills in order to try to secure from Mr. Charles, at Bala, a copy of the Bible for herself. On this story, from his own experience, Mr. Charles based a plea at a meeting of the Religious Tract Society, which was then newly formed, for the formation of a society with the object of distributing the Welsh Scriptures among the Welsh people. Quietly rose the Rev. Joseph Hughes, from the "pleasant village of Battersea," as it was in those days, and said: "Surely a society might be instituted for the purpose, and if for Wales, why not for the Kingdom, why not for the whole world?"

The Genesis of Great Religious Societies.

The idea of the formation of a society for the expansion of the Kingdom of God by means of literature was no novelty. The Society for the Promotion of Christian knowledge was founded in 1698, and its bicentenary, six years ago, was a very memorable anniversary here in London. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts had its origin in 1701. In 1785, when the Red Terror was about to deluge France with horrors, the Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools came into being through the wonderful work done at Gloucester by Robert Raikes. The great Church Missionary Society started in 1799, the Religious Tract Society in the same year, and the Sunday School Union in 1803.

One of God's Coincidences.

Those who believe in the mysterious operations of an all-beneficent Providence must be impressed with the fact that these societies, which steadily progressed until they attained immense influence, sprang up at the very crisis of modern religious history. Mr. William Canton has written a monumental book, in two large volumes, just issued by John Murray, on the History of the British and Foreign Society. These two volumes bring down the record to the end of the first fifty years of the Society's operations. Two other volumes are to appear in due time, treating of the second fifty years' period. I have been looking through these two grand volumes with delight. In one passage Mr. Canton says, "It is one of the arresting coincidences which mark its origin, that just at the time when Christian missions on a large scale were established, there should have sprung up this Society which was to give them breadth and permanence." Now, this truly philosophical remark must remind many of my readers of the oft-repeated lessons of history indicative of the over-ruling and appointing evidence of a divine purpose in the evolution of Christian activity. For Providence has never been unready. The Incarnation synchronized with the completion by Roman pioneers and engineers of the magnificent Imperial highways throughout the world that the Ceasars had conquered. The gospel came and found the material conditions for its propagation splendidly furnished by men who had worked better than they knew. The Great Reformation of the Middle Ages found the printing press just invented and everywhere beginning to work out the propagation of the truth in a new medium. All the preparations of Providence are dual.

The Two Divine Inspirations.

There is something else in which this principle of a Divine dualism is conspicuous. It is impossible to study the records of the magical success of this Society without being profoundly convinced that a supernatural impulse was imparted to the founders and the early prosecutors of the enterprise. There was, in their manner of adapting the new purpose, a catholicity of design and an enthusiasm of aim which even to this day are simply amazing. The Society captured the imagination of the Christian public from the very commencement. The most sanguine hopes of William Wilberforce, the great Slave Emancipationist, never soared beyond 10,000 pounds a year as the annual income of the Society. But four years after its birth the income had reached 12,000 pounds. In 1810 it more than doubled, and in 1813 it leaped to £70,000, in 1851 it passed £100,000, and since 1853 it has not fallen so low as £200,000. Last year the total receipts amounted to no less than £233,138. This wonderful growth would have been impossible but for the energetic formation of auxiliary societies all over the United Kingdom. It was, from the beginning, manifest that a heavenly sanction had favored the efforts as well as the designs of the founders and promoters. The first president once said, after the work had been going on for years, "The Society never wanted means and instruments for the furtherance of its objects." The great Earl of Shaftesbury was able to say, in 1880, that during its whole history the Bible Society had never made a great and irretrievable mistake. The hand of God was from first to last upon it for good. The men who originated the work were not famous or of surpassing influence, yet their success was uniform and phenomenal. God who inspired the thought inspired the men to carry it out. I am reminded of what I once heard my dear old friend, J. J. Haley, say: "When God brings forth an idea he incarnates it. When he puts forward a thought he places a man behind it." But the men are apt to be those of whom the world would otherwise never have heard.

A Secret of Success.

How One Woman Quit Medicine.

"While a coffee user my stomach troubled me for years," says a lady of Columbus, O., "and I had to take medicine all the time. I had what I thought was the best stomach medicine I could get; had to keep getting it filled all the time at 40 cents a bottle. I did not know what the cause of my trouble was, but just dragged along from day to day, suffering and taking medicine all the time.

"About six months ago I quit tea and coffee and began drinking Postum and I have not had my prescription filled since, which is a great surprise to me, for it proves that coffee was the cause of all my trouble, although I never suspected it.

"When my friends ask me how I feel since I have been taking Postum, I say, 'To tell the truth I don't feel at all, only that I get hungry and eat everything I want and lots of it, and it never hurts me, and I am happy and well and contented all the time.'

"I could not get my family to drink Postum for a while until I mixed it in a little coffee and kept on reducing the amount of coffee until I got it all Postum. Now they all like it and they never belch it up like coffee.

"We all know that Postum is a sunshine maker. I find it helps one greatly, for we do not have to think of aches and pains all the time, and can use our minds for other things." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The one who has to bother with coffee aches and pains is badly handicapped in the race for fame and fortune. Postum is a wonderful rebuild-er. There's a reason.

enterprise was inaugurated the religious world was rent and torn by thorny and bristling sectarianism. Part of the Divine influence which inspired these founders was an impulse by which they ignored, avoided, and overcame all tendency to sectarianism amongst themselves. The whole Christian Church was imbued with the utmost controversial acrimony. That aspect of the community shocked Thomas and Alexander Campbell and led to the Disciple Movement. The Bible Society was born partly as a protest in favor of Christian Unity. The Society did not, however, undertake to re-translate the Scriptures from the original in any fresh version, but simply accepted King James's Authorized Version and disseminated that. Thus, the merely transliterated term "baptize" was retained. The version in popular use was not interfered with. Of course that method might be ideally improved upon, and Alexander Campbell did improve on it; but it is certain that the Bible Society could not have come into existence on any other basis than that which it adopted. There are flaws in all God's earthen vessels. There is a blind spot in the eye. There are a few destructionist critics even amongst the Disciples of Christ. So I am told, and so I have found it evidenced. But defects do not invalidate the sublime perfection of adaptation of even imperfect means and instrumentalities to the predestined end. The Disciples of Christ are the most truly Biblical people I have ever learned to know, and they, above all others, must rejoice in the incomparable work done by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Society has actually translated the Bible into 437 languages and dialects!

Royalty and the Bible.

Prince Albert and Queen Victoria loved the Bible. The Book of God is honored still at the British court. March 10 was "Universal Bible Sunday." The King was indisposed, and it was not safe for him to proceed as arranged to St. Paul's Cathedral. But the Queen and some of the younger members of the royal family were present at the celebration service. The Bible is recognized as the bulwark of the British constitution. And while that is so, the Bible will be a saving power for the whole nation and for the whole empire. Finally, I rejoice that America also possesses a Bible Society, which, in process of time will, I trust, rival in the magnitude of its operations our own in the Old Country. Meantime let each of our churches of Christ stand before the world around it as a miniature Bible Society, and, criticism or no criticism, the Disciples of Christ will grow and flourish under the same holy inspiration which is so marvelously manifest in the history of this Society. On the remarkable speech given by the Hon. Mr. Choate, at the great Albert Hall meeting, I will not dwell here in detail, for I have no room, and it will assuredly appear in the American papers. But certain sentences in it were memorable. He took for his text the message cabled from President Roosevelt to the Bible Society, "Convey to the British and Foreign Bible Society my hearty congratulations on their centenary, and my earnest good wishes for the continued success of their great work." Mr. Choate romantically reviewed the history of copies of the sacred book in pioneer log-huts in the American wilderness, and he recalled the fact that New England, in its first generations, was the most biblical community on the face of the earth. Their laws and customs were founded on the Holy Book, which was read through in each family twice a year, from Genesis to Revelation.

"More Preachers Needed"—a Suggestion.

After reading Pres. L. M. Sniff's article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Feb. 25, on "More Preachers Needed," and the comments made by Brother Medbury in a later number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST (March 25), I cannot resist offering a suggestion.

Brother Medbury said: "As a people we must find the men, and then help the men find themselves, if the work of the future is to be done as the fathers have prepared the way." Of course the great need is more men, and the great question is, how to find them.

Pres. Sniff very largely sees the answer to this question by properly equipping and supporting preparatory schools where many young men who come to them may be led into the ministry. How this would relieve the situation! But how long will it take us to see this great need and learn this most important lesson? What are we going to do in the meantime for preachers to take the place of those who die and the others who become osteopaths, magnetic healers and controllers of Texas land and lumber financial bubbles, etc., etc.? Isn't there some other way by which we can "find the men" needed for the ministry without waiting until we build up these schools?

The church is the natural source of our preachers, but all are agreed that the rank and file of the church do not appreciate the supreme need of more preachers. This is a lamentable fact, but it is true. Consequently we cannot look to the church as a direct and reliable source just now.

In my judgment, the way to "find the men" whom we so badly need is through our present preaching brethren. Why not? They know of this need better than anyone else, except our Bible college professors. Knowing the environments of their converts, why can they not persuade them to preach the glorious gospel of this Christ whom they have honored as their Lord and King? This is not all theory. I attended our Kansas Lectureship last year at Emporia, Kansas, where a paper was read on the subject of ministerial supply, and in the general discussion one of our preachers made substantially this remark. "I have never been to college, but since I have been trying to preach, I have persuaded three young men into the Christian ministry." When in conversation with W. J. Lhamon about this matter, he made this statement: "Bro. J. L. Brandt told me he had started over sixty young men into the ministry." The preacher who was instrumental in making me a Christian, was heard to say, "I have sons in the gospel preaching in eighteen different states." Yet our great brotherhood hardly knows of Samuel Magee. J. B. Cor-wine has made Ralls county, Mo., well nigh famous for the large number of young men it now has in the ministry. These examples only indicate what can be done, to a greater or less degree, by each of our preachers if they will take personal pains and work persistently along this line.

Now, if the preachers, when they take up this work as I have tried to indicate, have these preparatory schools for which President Sniff so justly and ably pleads, to direct these young men to, after they have found them, there would be no reason for misgivings for the future of our ministry. May each of our preachers make his parish a recruiting station for young men for the ministry!

The Old Brethren.

L. W. Spayd's experience with the "old brethren" has many duplicates of varying degree. Years since F. D. Power as a stranger visited a congregation in England. In the midst of the service an elder, spying the unfamiliar face, descended from the platform and put our genial brother through a searching catechism: "Do you wish to participate in the 'fellowship?'" "Do you desire to break bread?" "Are you a member of the body of Christ?" "Have you been scripturally baptized?" The answers being affirmative, Bro. Power was allowed to make an offering and commune.

After the service the elder returned to discover the identity of the visitor, and extended to him some social courtesies. At night with the elder Bro. Power attended the service and was introduced to the preacher of the occasion. When the preacher found out who he was he treated him very coldly, if not rudely, and didn't even ask him to pronounce the benediction. In justice to the elder it should be said that he apologized to Bro. Power for this "distant treatment," and explained that their preacher had no fellowship with American Disciples, and that personally he wished that his sympathies were larger.

W. T. Moore's "Life of Timothy Coop" throws much light on this problem. When I united with the West London Tabernacle a series of articles from my pen were published in the Christian Commonwealth. They dealt with my reasons for abandoning sectarianism. I was soon flooded with letters, pamphlets, books, and especially copies of the "Ecclesiastical Observer," the organ of the Old Brethren, and I was urged to come to the true church and "not jump out of the frying pan into the fire." The American Disciples were stigmatized as worse than sectarians. The names of the organs, "Christian Commonwealth" and "Ecclesiastical Observer," respectively, very fittingly set forth the characteristics of the different movements. But I do not see much difference between those who are called "antis" in this country and the "Old Brethren." At least the treatment I have received from them is similar to that meted out to Bro. Power. Although the lines of cleavage have not been absolutely identical, the spirit is the same. So after all the "Old Brethren" are just "antis" plus certain British peculiarities and minus an American flavor. If Bro. Spayd will visit certain of our states, especially in the south, he will find as tough propositions confronting him as he met in South Africa, from almost every standpoint. He will not only have his brethren (?) against him, but he will be just as unable to make a living. He will not have the same sympathy and assistance from his immediate brethren, because "distance lends enchantment to the view."

The Missouri Lectureship.

One who has ever attended a session of the Missouri Lectureship always hungers and thirsts after more. Fulton will entertain all who come. One of our best schools for girls is located there. The program is excellent. The guest of honor, E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., is one of the most popular and eloquent lecturers among our people.

Northern California.

The missionaries under the State Board of Missions baptized 90 souls during the month of February, and added 43 others. No wonder it was a wet month! The people who thought we would have a dry year are not to be found. A few more April showers, and California will have most abundant harvests this year. The Lord is certainly smiling on this land.

The convention of the Sacramento Valley District just closed at Sacramento was unique in that the majority of the preachers present had come into the state in the past six months. It was a high water mark convention, too, for there was much water to be seen from the capitol dome, and in the home of the Sacramento church was warm hospitality, earnest words of encouragement and much enthusiasm manifested. The new ministers are a fine and promising lot of men, and we hope for very decided results from their presence among us.

T. B. Dry is at Eureka and at work.

C. C. Bentley, from Kansas, is on the ground at Hanford and busy at work.

W. F. Cowden, of Tacoma, is touring the churches in the interest of the May offering.

A. L. Platt, of Selma, will be called to the work of state evangelist May 1.

J. A. Carroll has obtained a leave of absence and will accompany T. H. Lawson, of Stockton, east May 1, on a lecture tour. They have a good machine, and it talks, too.

D. W. Honn, of Visalia, will sing for A. L. Platt, beginning May 8. They make a very fine team and will begin their work at Chico.

A few days ago I was invited into a fine automobile in company with an ex-presiding elder of the Swedish Methodist Church. They have planted a very strong colony at Kingsburg with three churches, and are now looking for other good locations. They would like a certain 2,400 acre tract, but I hope I have the inside track on that tract, so that we may see a Christian colony and a good, strong Christian church there.

We rode 50 miles in four and one-half hours, and saw some of the finest land God's sun ever shone upon. What could be better for a future Christian home than 20 acres in such a spot, with one's neighbors, in faith and practice the same, on every hand, with no saloons and a good church and schools?

The next day we rode 28 miles in four hours behind a fine team, through orchards and vineyards whose yield is such that the desire to retain your confidence in my truthfulness forbids my stating it.

Columbia Notes.

Pastor Winders and Dr. Moore returned from Chicago enthusiastic over the congress, and jubilant over securing it for Columbia next year. We shall welcome the congress, and our invitation to guests is out from now on.

I had the pleasure of supplying Brother Hart's pulpit in Fulton on the 20th. The Fulton church is strong and active, and realizes its great opportunity as regards young people. William Woods College of itself affords a handsome audience of young ladies. The college stands high in the affections of the Fulton people, and Brother Jones is both admired and loved for his work's sake.

Our architects assure us that the plans and specifications for our Bible College building will be ready for the contractors this week. We are now assured of a stone building in the Tudor style, in every way beautiful and commodious. We hope in a very few weeks to furnish the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers with a view of the building. We can express only upon our knees our gratitude for the blessings that have come upon us since last September. A growing work awaits us, and we long to make it a glorious one for the cause of Christ.

The University of Missouri is growing rapidly, and thousands of young people will in the future be thronging to this center of colleges year by year. It will be our joy to reach many of them, we are sure. They come from all sources—cities, towns, farms, other states and foreign countries. It is reported that there will be eight or ten from Egypt next year for the study of agriculture. Of the first 1,200 that registered last fall, 338 were from farms. It would seem to be a mistake to suppose that the state university does not reach the rural people. I believe that some such opinion was expressed recently, but certainly without foundation.

All of our young men who are ready for work are employed with churches, and we frequently have good reports from them. They love their work and the churches, and the churches love them.

In my absence a week ago last Sunday, President Jesse of the university lectured to the Bible class, and was especially happy in provoking religious thought. Last Sunday morning the class numbered 187.

Many will take pleasure in knowing that Miss Caroline E. Pope, of St. Louis, is taking work both in the Bible College and in Christian College preparatory to her work in India, whither she expects to go in a few months under the auspices of the C. W. B. M. Sister Bantz, I believe, has the joy of having discovered Miss Pope. Miss Pope is a trained nurse, who recently came to us from the Lutheran Church. She was engaged in the Orphans' Home in St. Louis, and now devotes her life to mission work in India. She is a bright and ardent student.

Kentucky.

R. J. Bamber, of Pittsburg, Pa., has accepted the call recently extended him by the church at Versailles, and expects to begin his work there on April 1. We gladly welcome him to the Blue Grass State.

W. H. Pinkerton, of the First Church, Paducah, is assisting D. F. Stafford in a meeting at the Third Church, Louisville, with Prof. Leonard Daugherty as leader of song.

President B. A. Jenkins recently delivered a very instructive stereopticon lecture in the Broadway Church, Lexington, on "Hawaii."

The Ninth District Sunday-school and C. W. B. M. convention will be held May 5, 6 at Versailles. A splendid program has been arranged.

I. J. Spencer, of the Central Church, Lexington, will assist the minister, H. D. Clark, in a meeting at Mt. Sterling, in April.

W. R. Jinnett, of Earlinton, has accepted a call to the Central Church, Columbus, Ind. Prof. Chas. Louis Loos delivered a very instructive address in Central Church, Lexington, recently on "Walter Scott—Preacher and Reform."

Editor J. B. Briney, of the Christian Companion, will preach once a month this year for the church at Campbellsville.

The First District Sunday-school and C. W. B. M. convention will be held on April 13, 14 at Shelbyville. The Eighth District convention will be held on April 28, 29 at Carlisle.

There are 33 more students enrolled in the College of the Bible this year than last. H. L. Calhoun will be added to the faculty next year.

W. E. Mobley has preached fifty years at Elkton and forty-nine years at Berea, half-time at each place. He is now eighty years of age, but is still vigorous and active and is doing excellent work for the Master in western Kentucky.

E. L. Powell, of the First Church, Louisville, preached in Macauley's Theater on last Sunday night, the 27th, on "Is There a Hell?"

We are glad to welcome A. P. Finley back to "Old Kaintuck." He has recently been located in California, but is now preaching for the churches at Warsaw, Sparta and Glenco, all in Gallatin county.

James Vernon, who recently resigned at Nicholasville, will begin work in his new field, Winchester, Ind., on the first Lord's day in April. Sorry to lose him from our state.

President J. W. McGarvey visited the church at Barbourville on Sunday, March 20, and assisted in the ordination service of elders and deacons.

T. S. Buckingham is supplying for the church at Maysville during the absence of their regular minister, R. E. Moss. He reports four added recently—three by baptism.

We are glad to report four more added here at regular services—three by baptism and one reclaimed.

Indiana Notes.

The spring series district conventions, will be held as follows: South Milford, April 11, 12; Laporte, 13, 14; Veedersburg, 14, 15; Delphi, 18, 19; Andrews, 20, 21; New Castle, 21, 22; Anderson, 25, 26; Terre Haute, 27, 28; Spencer, 28, 29; Lawrenceburg, May 2, 3; Brownstown, 4, 5; Odon, 5, 6; Princeton, 9, 10; Orleans, 10, 11. W. J. Wright, Washington, D. C., evangelist for New England, our Indiana state workers and a local representative from each district for Church Extension, will be present and assist in each convention. A splendid new state church map, ten feet long, will be another attraction. It is the best and most complete state, district and county mission map in existence. A study of this map alone will pay you for attending the convention.

With meetings running at Auburn (county seat mission), Hammond, Indiana Harbor (mission), Petersburg (county seat mission), Osgood, Richmond, by assistance of the State Board; with new churches organized at Terre Haute, Epsom, Ridgeport, Shiloh, Milford and Bryan; with 500 souls gathered in last week in evangelistic work; and with new houses of worship to be dedicated by the state evangelist, at Shiloh third Lord's day in April, Milford, fourth Lord's day in April, and Epsom, fourth Lord's day in May, it really looks like there is something doing in Indiana. The state now has 945 churches, with 1,000 open fields, and every one containing living Disciples, inviting, calling us to come in and possess the field. All we need is more money to get more men; and the Disciples, that is to say, the Christian people of Indiana, will see that these are provided.

Ohio Letter.

North Fairfield church has secured a pastor after quite a little effort. Brother Wayt, of West Virginia, is the fortunate man, and will begin work at once.

Ohio has three churches that will reach a thousand dollars or more for foreign missions this year. They are Cincinnati, Central, Akron, High Street, and Franklin Circle, Cleveland. These are good signs.

W. M. Taylor has been in Cleveland and vicinity the past two weeks, telling of his remarkable history in Porto Rico. O that we could make an offering May 1 that would make it possible to put a score of men in this wonderfully ripe field!

The daily press says C. M. Oliphant has resigned at Paris, Ill., and will move to Cortland, Ohio, and go into business.

Sunday, March 20, was the birthday of the fifth church in Columbus and vicinity. The new child is at Linden Heights, three miles from the center of the city, and has a charter membership of about 30. They already have a fine lot and will build a house this season. Secretary Bartlett says Columbus has had the healthiest missionary growth of any city in the state. Six years ago there were two churches, now five. The three new ones have grown up rather than boomed up, and each has come from a mission Sunday-school of two years' life. The work in Ohio's capital was never so flourishing or better led than now.

Another get-rich-quick scheme has attacked some Ohio preachers. This time the headquarters are in Wisconsin. O Lord, how long?

I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, brought "Peter's Wife's Mother" up to Cleveland and vicinity and introduced her to good audiences at Bedford, Glenville and Collinwood to the delight of all. This lecture is an excellent tonic for spring fever.

The churches of Cleveland and community will rally around the flag and shout "America for Christ" at the Euclid Avenue Church, Wednesday, April 13. Z. T. Sweeney will be there as the 13-inch gun. What the harvest will be cannot be stated until May 1, when the offering for home missions shall be made and counted.

M. B. Ryan, bishop at Glenville, is holding a meeting and trying to revive the church at Richwood. This was the home for some years of the Octographic Review and its editor. It is to be hoped that it may be said of their influence, as of our pilgrimage here on the earth, "We shall live, but not forever."

It is none too soon for Ohio Disciples to be thinking of the state convention. This year everybody is going to Cleveland, May 23-26. The program is already completed and will be an attractive one. The convention will be held in the old stone church on the public square. This is an ideal location. The Forest City will be at its best at this season of the year. The committees are working already for your entertainment and comfort. Come, brethren, by scores and hundreds to Cleveland, May 23-26. We will tell you more about it as the days go by.

Colorado.

The church at Denver, and indeed throughout the entire state, has suffered a great loss in the death of Judge Isaac E. Barnum. The present board of elders paid a beautiful tribute to his memory at his funeral services. He occupied many positions of responsibility and trust in the Central, prominent among them the chairmanship of the building committee which erected the present modern house of worship for the Central. He was identified with the mission work of the state, serving a number of years as a member of the state board, occasionally as its president, and one year as president of the convention. The funeral services were held at the Central Church, March 25. It was very fitting that Wm. Bayard Craig, pastor of the Central, who had been associated with Brother Barnum in the beginning of the Central Church, should deliver the memorial address.

The state board has authorized the committee on a summer assembly in Colorado to prepare for such a meeting if they shall deem it wise. Further announcement will follow.

F. F. Walters, of Grand Junction, is in a meeting with his home church. Nine additions to March 22, with interest and attendance excellent. Brother Walters' mother in Coffeyville, Kan., who was so ill, is recovering.—William L. Clinex closed his pastorate at Manzanola, April 1, and Eli Walker, of Miltonvale, Kan., succeeds to the place May 1.—J. P. Davis, of Missouri, is supplying the pastorate at Trinidad from March 1 to July 1, the period of absence of the pastor, David C. Peters, who is in the Orient.—S. K. White closed at Windsor with March. No one has yet been found to take that work.

J. W. Maddux closed his meeting with his home church, Golden, March 20, with 23 added, and four others awaiting baptism. Including the union meetings in the town, he has spoken from five to seven times per week for ten weeks, and this while suffering almost continually with lagrippe. A Junior Society Christian Endeavor with 25 members has been organized.—G. W. Coffman closed his work at Paonia, March 1, and has removed to a ranch near that place.

Ward Russell, the pastor at Florence, is on a lecture tour of four weeks, extending through Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Illinois and Minnesota. He divides the net proceeds with the Christian Endeavor Society of his church to aid the building fund.

The corresponding secretary held a ten days' meeting at Rifle in March, and organized a church with 20 members. Others will be added to the charter membership roll. All meetings were held in the Methodist Church building, their pastor cheerfully recalling their mid-week meeting, also inviting the secretary to occupy his pulpit each Sunday evening of the meeting. The choir of the church also led the singing. The preacher believes he preached the gospel faithfully, but the kindest feeling between the two bodies of believers was maintained throughout. Probably this is an example of "fraternity and fidelity" of which the editor wrote recently.

Robert W. Moore closed a meeting with his own church at Lamar, on Feb. 28, with 14 additions, seven by confession. The meeting was held under serious difficulties, many of the members being sick, also the pastor himself a part of the time.

The corresponding secretary attended county Sunday-school conventions at Trinidad, Las Animas and La Junta, in company with Rev. J. C. Carman, superintendent of the Colorado State Sunday-school Association in March, delivering several addresses.

The Denver papers are authority for the statement in a communication from Loveland, that the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church will begin in the coming summer the erection of cottages for their orphanage work in Colorado. We are glad to receive this good news. It is stated that the first cottage will be named the McMillan memorial, in memory of Brother McMillan, who resided in Loveland and preached there many years ago.

Miss Mossie L. Elmore, of Trinidad, state superintendent of Christian Endeavor, is doing good work, and we ask all the societies to co-operate heartily to make her work a still greater success.

The Bible-school at Greeley has had an average attendance of 85 for six months. Their offerings the second Lord's day of each month are devoted to the building fund. This school is but a little more than one year old, and the church not that old. It is a mission of the state board, and Greeley is the seat of the State Normal School.

St. Louis Letter.

All St. Louis is getting ready as rapidly as possible to see the many thousand friends who will come from all parts of the world during this year. Old pavements are being replaced with new ones, streets paved, hotels renovated, boarding houses repainted, private homes set in order. Even our machine government is taking interest in the welfare of the people who are to visit us, and are preparing special protection for them while they are with us.

The great buildings of the Great Fair are nearly completed, and as soon as the grass covers the ground and the leaves cover the trees it will be indeed a fairy land. The buildings are magnificent. The plan of the ground and the arrangement of the buildings are all that the most artistic taste could ask for, and when all is completed the visitor must feel that at least for once in his life he is permitted to walk in and breathe the atmosphere of the world of beauty.

The management have sought to make this exhibition not a display of freaks and monstrosities, but a great world school, where every nation can for a season go to school to the great thinkers in the world of art and industry.

It will afford an opportunity for us to see concrete illustrations of what other nations, as well as our own, are doing. And the foreigners coming to our shores, many of them for the first time, will have an opportunity to see what a Republic can accomplish in the short space of one hundred years.

The only embarrassing feature discovered so far is the immensity of the show. It is simply impossible for any one to see it all, even though he be there every day from the opening to the close. Hence, it is important for those who desire to make a study of the Fair to in some way systematize their work. It will be well to read up carefully the daily reports of the things to be seen; to get a descriptive guide book and study it before coming to the city; to decide what department one desires more especially to study; to plan in so far as possible what one is going to do before ever he goes into the grounds.

If it be at all possible everybody should attend this Fair. This for several reasons. It will most likely be the last opportunity of the same kind for many years. There will, of course, be expositions on a small scale in different parts of the country; but it is not probable that there will be another comparable to this, as a world school, during the time of any one now living. Other expositions will necessarily be local both as to place and product displayed. St. Louis is so situated that it is easy of access from any part of the United States.

To our own people we wish to say that we think this exposition will mean much. We are not thinking of anything narrow or sectarian. But as a means of education, a broadening of our views; as a means of bringing us into a closer touch with all the world, it will mean much, and we covet the presence at some time during the year of all of our people. We want to make the national convention in keeping with the spirit of the Fair—something great. It should be in many respects the greatest convention that we have ever held. With the watchwords we have accepted for the year, with the ideals that we have set before us, with the hope of hearing reported that we have realized our ideals, with the combined thought of attending the greatest convention ever held by our brethren, and at the same time attending the greatest educational exhibition the world has ever seen, all of our people should begin at once to lay plans to be here in October.

JESUS TRANSFIGURED.—

Mark 9:2-13.

Memory Verses 2-4.

GOLDEN TEXT:—A voice came out of the cloud, saying: "This is my beloved Son; hear Him." Mark 9:7.

The Chosen Three.

"To him that hath shall be given," said Jesus. In things spiritual it is especially true that blessings come to those who have already been blessed. And necessarily so. It is not the harsh and arbitrary mandate of injustice, but the inevitable law of life. The highest spiritual experiences are attainable only by those who have been prepared for them. To any others, they would be mere emptiness and profanation. So it came about that Jesus was not transfigured in the presence of the throng which followed Him only to profit by His miracles of feeding and healing, nor even in the presence of the entire group of His intimate Twelve. But He took the three who were, by temperament and spiritual attainments, best qualified to understand the unique vision which was about to be given to them,—no, not to understand it, for no one could have done that, but to catch some glimpse of its real spiritual meaning, and to transmit it most fruitfully to succeeding ages.

The Narratives.

Wonderful in its simplicity is this narrative of a most wonderful event. How an ordinary uninspired writer would have been lured into picturesque detail and grotesque embellishment of this plain story! None of the three evangelists who tell of the episode seems to feel that it is at all surprising or that it stands at all in need of explanation or substantiation. Doubtless they had come to feel that it was a natural thing for Jesus to appear as He did here on Mount Hermon. And so, indeed, it was, far more natural than for the Son of God to be "found in fashion as a man," as He was on every day except this during His earthly life. What would have been a marvelous, miraculous event for a mere man, was for Jesus on a reversion to the normal.

It is somewhat surprising that John, who was himself one of the chosen three who witnessed the transfiguration and the only one of the evangelists who did have that privilege, is also the only one of the four evangelists who does not record the transfiguration. Was it because John, writing from that height of spiritual exaltation and with that insight into divine things which he had attained by almost a century of Christian experience, thought so constantly of Jesus as the Eternal Word, the permanently transfigured Lord, that this momentary transfiguration on Mount Hermon was lost sight of by being merged into a background which was identical with it?

On the Mount.

What was it then which transpired on the Mount that day, when, in the presence of the apostles of the new time, the law-giver and the prophet of the old time met with the Lord of all time? A whitening of the garments, a shining of the face—but was that all? Surely these merely physical phenomena did not constitute the essence of that transformation in the presence of which Peter forgot the dull, gray duties of life and longed to remain upon the mountain. Some things defy human language, and this is one of them. Evidently the purpose and the effect of the transfiguration was to show to the chosen three the true glory of their Lord—not a mere radiance of raiment and features, but a manifestation of the abiding radiance of soul. Whatever the manifestation was, it clearly conveyed to its beholders a higher conception of Jesus and of the desirability of endless companionship with Him. All our knowledge of Jesus—whether it comes from reading the record of

His life, or from seeing the shining deeds of His disciples, or from the experience of personal fellowship with Him—is of value only in so far as it creates in us a like desire to have Him for our permanent companion.

Vision and Service.

Peter's suggestion showed that he had caught part of the message of the transfiguration, but only part. He wanted to be with Jesus, but he had not learned that no one can be with Jesus by going apart from men. There may be moments of withdrawal for soul refreshment, but the Lord's abiding presence is to be found where His work is waiting to be done—and that is in the midst of His needy brethren. Not on the mountain, but in the valley must the Lord's disciples pitch their tabernacles if they would have Him with them. At the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration a demoniac boy was waiting to be healed, and at the foot of every mount of spiritual vision and uplift are the waiting multitudes, for the relief of whose needs the gold of all our visions must be minted into the coin of service.

HOW CHRIST TRANSFORMS LIVES.

Rom. 12:1, 2; Phil. 3:20, 21.

For the Leader.

Correctly speaking, there is no better way of putting it than as worded in the topic. It is Christ who transforms, and not the person. Yet we are in the habit of saying of a man that he has reformed. Now this is all right if we keep in mind the work that Christ has to do in every genuine reformation. To keep this clearly in mind, and to make proper distinction, will save us much confusion. This has not always been done. Such mysticism has grown up around our religious ideas that, in some instances, the sinner has given himself up to waiting for the Lord to reform him in his own good time. Such an one will wait a long time. Let him awake and call upon the Lord. On the other hand, we see a man so void of any sense of the divine help in turning from sin that it is purely a secular matter with him. This is another extreme, and is as bad, maybe worse, than the former error. Let us come to the full truth in our study of this topic to-night.

For the Members.

1. In the first place we are told in the first verse of the twelfth chapter of Romans to present our bodies as sacrifices unto the Lord. We get the idea here of an offering up of the lusts of the flesh, as well as a consecration of all that is good in us to the Lord. That which is placed upon the altar is given up. If it be sinful pleasures we have abandoned them. If it be our abilities to do good and to worship and adore the Lord, it means that forever this shall be our chief employment.

2. This same verse tells us that this is a reasonable service to render to the Lord. It is reasonable because it is best. That is, when we look into the matter, from whatever point of view we may, reason says that is the best and safest way. To make a partial offering of the body is to realize only a partial salvation. The divided heart is a failure in any undertaking. What is worth doing at all is worth doing well. This has become a truism with us. Let us, then, see that the work of God in the plan of salvation is laid out along the same line of thought. There is no fundamental conflict anywhere between the interests of our natures and our bodies and the interests of our souls.

3. The second verse says we are not to be conformed to this world, but to be transformed. What does that mean? It means to be changed in our ideals and actions from the false view of life held by that great unchurched body of the sons of men. The first thing is to get one to think right. The will, the intention, the desire, must be right. This mental, this heart change, is referred to in the text in the phrase, "the renewing of your mind." The sinner is not only wrong in conduct, but he has a false view of God's world. Until he sees this fundamental error in his plan, all his efforts at righteousness will be artificial, ephemeral. This is the doctrine of a change of heart from a rational and scriptural point of view. But that it is the commonly accepted view, I am not ready to say.

4. But how does Christ purpose to effect this transformation in heart and conduct? Will he bring before us a theology? Will he hold up certain doctrines to be learned off by heart? Not at all. His theology is not in a book, but in a life. It is not abstract, but concrete. That is, all he has in the way of doctrine or theology is embodied in his life. We are called to a higher and better life, which is offered to us as the only safe and reasonable way to live for this world and the world to come. This call comes to us in his person pure, holy, full of love and compassion. I am asked to love him and accept him; to understand and to follow him. He is made upon my level in the flesh while he is living out the divine demonstration. I follow, and it all becomes plain to me. I live the doctrine, and I know of its truth.

Quiet Hour Thought.

Is it the passion of my soul to bring about this transformation in the lives of others?

TESTS OF DISCIPLESHIP.—

Matt. 16:24.

"If any man would come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me."

A Crisis in Jesus' Life. The incident by which this passage is connected marks one of the crises in the life of Jesus. He had drawn from His disciples, by His questions, the confession, through Simon Peter, that He was the Christ, the Son of God, and He had announced His purpose to build His church on that rock-truth. Having brought them to this view of His character and mission, He felt that the time had arrived when He could announce to them plainly His betrayal and crucifixion at the hands of His enemies. They must be prepared for this inevitable culmination of His earthly ministry which He clearly foresaw, but which was hidden from them. No sooner, however, had He made this startling announcement, than Peter rebuked him, saying: "Be it far from Thee, Lord: this shall never be unto Thee." Of course it seemed to Peter, and probably to the other disciples, that this meant the failure of all the fond hopes they had cherished of the coming kingdom of God. Looking at it from a purely human point of view, as Peter did, it seemed to him that Jesus' death meant the failure of His plans.

An Old Temptation. It was not the first time that Jesus had met with the suggestion, or temptation, to establish His kingdom by other means than by the lowly path of self-sacrifice and crucifixion. He had met and resisted this temptation, immediately after His baptism. He recognizes it now, though coming from one of His disciples, as essentially the same idea which had been presented by Satan, and so turning to Peter he said: "Get thee behind Me, Satan: thou art a stumbling-block unto Me: for thou mindest not the things of God, but the things of men." And then He laid down the law of discipleship which we have in the text given for our study: "If any man would come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me."

A Universal Law. Not only, then, was it true that Christ could accomplish His mission in the world only through the law of sacrifice, by laying down His life for the world, but He announces here a universal law of discipleship. Every man who would be a disciple of Jesus must become obedient to the same law; that is, he must take up his cross and follow Jesus. We can only unite with Christ as we come into union with Him through conformity to the same law by which He won His kingdom. This is the royal road to discipleship, and there is no other. Confession, baptism, uniting with the church—these are but the outward signs or expressions of the inward principle, which alone can make one a disciple of Christ—the willingness to follow Christ even at the sacrifice of life itself, if need be, and like Him seek not to please ourselves, but to serve others.

Cross Bearing, What Is It? What is it to take up one's cross and follow Christ? It is to ask what is right? what is duty? what would Christ have me to do? and to do that, no matter what opposition or inconvenience or hardship it may involve. It is to get Christ's point of view of life, as far as it is possible, and to be true to that. It is to prefer a good conscience and fellowship with Christ to ease, to personal popularity or self-aggrandizement.

Self-Examination. Let us examine ourselves by this test which the Master has given us. Are we disciples of Jesus? Not unless we are cross-bearers. What cross are you bearing for Christ? What sacrifice are you making for His kingdom? "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His."

Prayer: O Lord, as Thou hast called us to be Thy disciples, we humbly beseech Thee to grant us grace whereby we may be willing to take up the cross daily and follow Thee, through evil report and through good report, in adversity as well as in prosperity, that we may share with Thee in Thy glory, in Thy eternal kingdom. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

Our Budget

—Home missions to the front.

—You may have heard this motto before, and you are likely to hear it again until home missions is marching at the head of the procession.

—We furnish some fuel this week to feed the flame of religious and patriotic zeal which blend together in the work of home missions.

—Now that Easter is past, let us seek to live in the power of the risen life. "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above."

—The Maplewood Christian Church, St. Louis, dedicated its new building last Sunday. See report elsewhere. This is the congregation of which Bro. G. A. Hoffmann is pastor, and its growth has been very encouraging.

—G. L. Wharton, of Calcutta, India, will preach in Maryville, April 10.

—Prof. Keith is filling the Bethany pulpit until a regular minister can be secured.

—You will never make men think a thing is important by apologizing for your interest in it.

—There has been a gain in the receipts from the churches for foreign missions of over $4 000.

—If you want men to give, you must ask them to give, and then give them the opportunity to give.

—There is nothing about home missions that needs defence. The aggressive campaign is the need of the home land.

—The Aurora, Mo., congregation has employed Bro. A. J. Williams, of Marionville, as a regular preacher for the coming year.

—Prof. Atwater, who was a member of the faculty of Indiana University for more than a quarter of a century, has been elected professor emeritus of Latin.

—J. A. Canby, now minister at Ann Arbor, Mich., will bring back with him to the university town his father's family, after a visit to his old friends in Virginia.

—Cephas Shelburne spent the third Sunday with the church at Angola, Ind., and "preached," says the Angola paper, "two very able and beautiful sermons to large audiences."

—Ernest H. Boyd, baritone, has returned from his southern trip, and any pastor or evangelist wishing a singing evangelist will address him at Creston, Iowa.—R. H. INGRAM.

—G. M. Read, Mapleton, Kan., called this week at this office, returning from a visit east. He is desirous of locating with some church in that state, and may be addressed as above.

—W. P. Aylsworth, of Cotner University, recently delivered his popular lecture, "Napoleon Bonaparte," at Tabor, Ia. By invitation of the faculty it was given in the auditorium of Tabor College.

—Dean W. J. Lhamon, Missouri Bible College, Columbia, Mo., delivered an address on "The Literature of the Bible" before W. H. McClain's Bible class at the Hamilton Hotel on Monday evening last.

—Last week the Foreign Society received a gift of $500 on the annuity plan from a friend in Indiana. The society hopes many others will remember the work in foreign lands in the same substantial way.

—The political campaign in Missouri is waxing very hot. Can't we get as much in earnest in our religious campaign? The fight for civic righteousness should be supplemented by evangelistic work, for the gospel has the power to save the state as well as the individual.

—Bro. O. A. Bartholomew preached at the Hammett Place Christian Church on Sunday morning last a sermon on the occasion of the 48th anniversary of his ministry. Although he is in very feeble health, the sermon is said to have been vigorous in style, reminiscent and tender in its character. He has a warm place in the hearts of the St. Louis brethren for the work he has accomplished.

—During the past month George Kilgen & Son, of St. Louis, have finished building pipe organs in the churches at Lancaster, Ky., and Marshall, Mo. They have also begun the erection of one for the church at Danville, Ind. Evidently our churches are increasing in their appreciation of the value of good music as a feature of public worship.

—Wren J. Grinstead has found the Australian climate detrimental to the health of both Mrs. Grinstead and himself, and has consequently resigned at Grote St., Adelaide, in order to return to America. He hopes to be ready for engagement by September. Communications for him, if sent care John T. Hawkins, 61 Headley Ave., Lexington, Ky., will be duly forwarded.

—The Laporte (Ind.) Daily Herald of March 30, says that: "Rev. Geo. E. Hicks, pastor of the Christian Church, will have completed his second year's work here next Sunday, and last evening at a meeting of the official board of the church, satisfaction was expressed very forcibly by the Board's increasing the reverend gentleman's salary the snug sum of two hundred dollars per annum. The church is certainly prospering under his pastorate."

—P. C. MacFarlane, of Alameda, Calif., in a personal letter to the editor, writes: "Bro. Van Kirk is doing a great work this year. He has come out of his trying ordeals with a spirit sweet and pure as of yore and the same cheerful optimism. He has a large place in the hearts of Californians." We are glad to know that these things are true, and that Bro. Van Kirk is rising to the great opportunity which presents itself to him in that great state.

—S. W. Brown, writing from Helena, Mont., under date of March 22, says: "Am delighted with this broad and breezy country, with these grand brethren and these glorious mountains. Had David kept his flocks near this city he could have truly said of this place, as of Jerusalem, 'As the mountains are round about Helena, so is the Lord round about them that fear Him.'" Bro. Brown recently went from Indianapolis to take pastoral care of the First Christian Church in Helena.

—And now comes the Bethany Herald, booming the Bethany Beach summer resort. Both poetry and prose are laid under contribution to sound its praise. The Assembly will begin "about July 12, and will continue until about the middle of August, possibly a little later." The Herald is published monthly by H. J. Penrod, M. D., at 10 cts. a year at Ocean View, P. O., Del. We are glad to call attention to this rallying center of our Eastern brethren, and to wish it abundant success. These summer assemblies have in them great possibilities of good.

—A misplaced comma very often changes the whole meaning of a sentence. A wrong initial may convey just as false an impression. In our last week's issue it was stated that John L. Brandt was going to supply the pulpit of a Mississippi Presbyterian Church during April. John L. Brandt should have been John B. Brandt, who is a Presbyterian minister. We ought to have known that Bro. Brandt, of the First Church, St. Louis, is too busy at this season of the year to be running off as a supply for Presbyterian or any other religious organization. We had the paragraph on good authority, but the initials were confused.

—It is the newspaper men who are generally credited with the ability to write "scare-head" lines, but some preachers might rival the newspaper men. We have just received a card with the head: "Preacher's Wife Pounded at Atlanta, Iowa." This is startling enough to make one wonder what the preacher's wife was doing, but the information further conveyed speaks of such simple and delightful things as ice cream and cake, which are evidence rather of a friendly feeling than any desire to batter the poor preacher's wife. The meaning of the news is that W. B. Crewdson and wife have just celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of their marriage, and a great many friends reminded them of this happy event in a surprise party in which a pound of silver dollars was presented as an expression of friendly feeling.

—J. R. Shie, who is sojourning for a few weeks of much needed rest and recuperation at long Beach, Cal., has received a unanimous call from the East Side Church, Los Angeles, and expects to take charge as soon as he is well enough. Harry Wilhite, of Oxnard, is called at San Bernardino.

—Frank J. Nichols, who has for some time been pastor of the West End Christian Church in this city, has tendered his resignation to take effect June 1st, in order to practice medicine, for which he has been preparing himself during his residence in the city. R. G. Stockton, of the Majestic Range Co. of this city, is chairman of the committee on securing a new pastor. This is one of the newer and smaller churches of the city, but it is a good field, and with an energetic, able young man as pastor, can accomplish a good work.

—Up to date we have received cash on pledges on World's Fair Building, $1,467.50. The total amount pledged is $2,857.50. We need more than $1,000 additional pledges, and will need the cash on all of them by May 1. May we not expect that our public-spirited members, in all the states, will respond promptly to this urgent need? Checks or drafts should be made payable to J. H. Allen, treasurer, and may be sent directly to him at 104 South Main St., St. Louis, or through this office. Colleges, missionary societies and other organizations desiring to make an exhibit, should prepare same and have them ready by May 1.

—References having been made recently in some of our journals to the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, as under the support of the American Christian Missionary Society, it seems proper that the following statement from Bro. Ames should be published:

"The American Christian Missionary Society has contributed no money to the support of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, since November, 1898. I became the pastor of this church October 1, 1900.

EDWARD S. AMES."

5520 Madison Ave., Chicago, April 2.

We wish to add, on our own knowledge, that the church is a liberal contributor, according to its ability, to our various missionary interests.

—One of our good brethren writes that he has felt inclined for a year or two to write for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST occasionally, but hesitated about doing so, "because several years ago when I was more pugnacious than I am now, I used to pitch into the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST." He adds further: "But as my mental horizon broadens, and as I try to live more and more the Christ-life, I am getting out of some of my former ideas and notions of men and things." We quote this not only because of its commendable spirit of frankness, but to say that no brother who has ever criticised this paper or its editor need suppose, for a moment, that he is any less welcome on that account as a contributor to our columns. While we cannot afford a fatted calf for every such returning prodigal, they can always rely on finding at least a slice of veal and a hearty welcome at our board!

—A letter from Bro. J. W. Harrison, dated Atlanta, Ga., March 25, states that he and his wife have completed their outward journey of about a thousand miles by wagon road from New York to that city. They left New York Sept. 19, reaching Atlanta March 16. He writes: "My health is fully restored and am glad we took the trip. Some people think we have suffered privation, but such is not the case. Indeed it has been quite a pleasure trip. We have seen some lovely country and have become acquainted with men and things. We have had quite a number of pleasant cottage meetings in people's houses along the way, and have learned that our plea finds favor much more than I could have expected." He mentions the fact that people of various religious bodies have received him kindly and have spoken words of encouragement to him. He and his wife are at present guests of the mayor of Atlanta, who is a member of the Christian Church of that city. They were to leave Atlanta on the 30th inst. on their return trip home through Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio and Pennsylvania, expecting to arrive in New York about September next.

—The dates of the summer conferences of the Young People's Missionary Movement are officially announced as follows: The Western Conference at Winona Lake, Ind., June 17-26, the Southern Conference at Lookout Mountain, Tenn., July 1-10, and the Northern Conference at Silver Bay on Lake George, N. Y., July 22-31. It is expected that the missionary secretaries for Young People's work of the leading missionary boards of America will be present. In addition to these, an invitation is extended to leaders and workers in national, state, district and local Sunday-school and Young People's organizations. Additional information may be had by addressing The Young People's Missionary Movement, 156 Fifth Ave., New York City.

—The executive committee of the Missouri Lectureship has made an effort to arrange a good program for the Fulton meeting, April 11-14, and the men enlisted from the home state, together with the popular Louisville orator, E. L. Powell, are a sufficient guarantee of an interesting and profitable meeting. Bro. E. M. Smith, on behalf of the committee, writes: "As preachers, our present duty to the speakers and to ourselves is to arrange to attend every session of the lectureship, and to try to secure the attendance of those outside the ministry as far as possible. Fulton has extended a very gracious invitation, and we trust the brotherhood will accept with the same cordiality." We announce elsewhere the railroad connections.

—W. A. Fite has closed his work at Maryville, Mo., where there were eleven additions during the last week of his stay. His nine and a half months' ministry added 98 to the church, the net gain being 78. Bro. Fite leaves Maryville, which now has a membership of nearly 900, with great regret. The people, he says, are the very best, and their expression of appreciation of their pastor took a tangible form in some handsome presents. R. A. Omer preached for the congregation on Easter Sunday. This church has for the past two years made the largest offering of any in the brotherhood to the Benevolent Association, and they still hope to hold the banner next year. The successor of Bro. Fite, who is now taking up his work in Texas, has not yet been chosen.

—B. B. Tyler was nominated by Amos R. Wells, of the Christian Endeavor World, as a member of the Council of the Religious Education Association. The proposal was heartily seconded by Dr. Peloubet, whose Sunday-school work is so well known, and the nomination was unanimously ratified. It is interesting to note that Mr. Wells, who attended the recent meeting of the association at Philadelphia, declares that he "could discover no animus against the International Sunday-school movement, and heard no utterances leaning toward the modern or destructive criticism of the Bible." Many will agree with Mr. Wells that "it seems of the greatest importance that conservative men should not hold aloof from the association, but work heartily in it and be at hand to check any dangerous tendencies if they develop." We sincerely trust that Brother Tyler will throw in his lot with this movement.

—Miss N. C. Metzger, of this city, is circulating a petition, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., to the Excise Commissioner and to the members of the police board, urging them to enforce in its entirety, the law pertaining to the closing of saloons on Sunday, namely, that all doors of such saloons be closed from Saturday at twelve o'clock (midnight) to Sunday twelve o'clock (midnight), and that no intoxicants of any kind or character be sold or given away on such premises during that time. The petition is receiving thousands of signatures, but we imagine there must be a reorganization of our city government before there is any serious attempt to enforce even Sunday closing. The recent attempt under the recommendation of the grand jury to close the saloons from one o'clock to seven o'clock on Sunday morning was not wholly successful, several violations being reported. How much more, therefore, would the saloon-keepers trample under their feet an order requiring them to close during the whole of Sunday. But the fight is on for law-enforce-

Our New President.

[From the Butler Collegian.]

At the meeting of the board of directors last Friday afternoon, Dr. Winifred Ernest Garrison was chosen president of Butler College, to succeed President Butler. Dr. Garrison has been connected with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, one of the leading papers of the Disciples. After having studied at Bethany College, West Virginia, and Eureka College, Ill., he went to Yale, where he was graduated with the class of '94, being one of the university's honor men. Later he took a post-graduate and theological course at the University of Chicago, where he obtained the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in 1897. For the one year following, '97-'98, he taught history in the university, then came to Butler and held the chair of history for two years. From Irvington he went to St. Louis to accept the editorship of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. . . . Dr. Garrison will assume his duties at the beginning of the next term. It was at the request of President Butler that the board fixed this early date. The new president can then plan for the summer and fall work of the college. He will come at a most auspicious time, for now the board has plans by which the usefulness of Butler may be widened. His coming will undoubtedly add strength to our college, for he is a friend to the small school and is in sympathy with the high ideals for which Butler has always stood. He will wield a potent influence over the students—an influence for good that goes to make up sturdy manhood and beautiful womanhood.

He is still a young man, and is, perhaps the youngest college president in the United States,—being but thirty years old. But he is progressive, and his high intellectual attainment should do much to put Butler in the forefront among the colleges of Indiana and of the country. Though a Missourian by birth, he has a warm place in his heart for Indiana and her institutions. In fact, Indiana is half his home, for he married an Indianapolis girl, Miss Annie Dye.

Dr. Garrison has traveled extensively and has written several volumes of his travels, one of which is "Wheeling Through Europe." He has also a theological work entitled "Alexander Campbell's Theology." Dr. Garrison has often visited the college and spoken of his travels. The last time, he told of his journeys in Norway and Sweden.

ment, and there will at least be an opportunity of finding out how many of our officials feel bound by their oath of office as respects this matter.

—Howard T. Cree, who resigned his position as pastor of the Central Christian Church, this city, a few weeks since to accept the work at Augusta, Ga., closed his labors with the Central Church on last Lord's day, preaching morning and evening to large audiences. At the close of the morning service a committee, appointed at a previous meeting for that purpose, submitted resolutions expressive of the high appreciation of the congregation of Brother Cree and of his labors for the church, and also of his good wife, who seems to have given as good satisfaction in her sphere as her husband in his. The resolutions were highly complimentary to Brother Cree, and were unanimously endorsed by the congregation. His family physician and personal friend, Dr. Larew, made confession of Christ at the morning service. Brother Cree left on Monday noon with his family for Covington, Ky., whence, after visiting friends for a few days, they will proceed to their future home, Augusta, where he is to preach next Lord's day. Brother Cree has greatly endeared himself to the brotherhood in St. Louis and to the other ministers of the city by his ability and consecration to the work of the Master. He and his good wife will be followed by the good wishes and prayers of a large company of friends in St. Louis, who will rejoice to learn of their success.

—We have received the program of the Christian Endeavor section of the Missouri state meeting, which is to be held at Carrollton, June 17-22, 1904. There is promise of a very interesting gathering. We will give the program in full at a later date.

—Bro. A. R. Moore, writing from Birmingham, Ala., March 18, says: "This day is the anniversary of my coming to Birmingham. In the year we have had 47 additions and built a new church costing complete about $21,000. It is built of light brown brick trimmed with white stone. It is modern in every appointment. All rooms can be thrown together and afford seatings for 850 people. We could not have built this house without the aid of our Church Extension Board, which loaned us $6,000. We are not strong here numerically or financially, and it seems a marvelous thing that a small congregation could raise for current expenses and building more than $16,000 in a single year, but this has been done; all obligations have been met, all missionary offerings taken, and the church is in a flourishing condition." We are sure these words of encouragement will be read with interest by the brethren everywhere. Bro. Moore is to be in a meeting at Anniston, Ala., April 4 to 20.

—The "Pew and Pulpit" department of the Globe-Democrat, agent the coming of our new assistant editor, gives the following dissertation on the Moores:

The Christian Church in St. Louis is never without a Moore. "We have more Moores," said a member of Mount Cabanne congregation recently, "than of any other kind of people, even the Joneses or Smiths." There is one church, that at Hammett Place, which, it seems, fate will never allow to have any pastor save one named Moore. Three different men of that name, one an evangelist, have been pastor there, and the present pastor is named Moore. It was a Moore in recent years who was pastor at the Fourth Church. It was a Moore, Dr. W. T., at Columbia, who was in England the most distinguished member of the Christian Church. He ranks high in this country, also. And now comes his son, Paul Moore, to add one more of those in St. Louis. For Paul Moore is to be assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, beginning next week.

The philology of the name throws no light on the fact that so many of the Moores have cast their lot with the quiet, earnest, simple-minded folk known as Christians. A Moor is a native of Morocco, or a very dark-faced person generally; or he may be, in Manx dialect, the officer who summons court in the different districts or shreds; or he is akin to the bonneted high lord mayor in that, sometimes, he appears as the bailiff of a farm. None of these ancestors of the St. Louis Christian Moores appear to have transmitted their traits to posterity. There is one other, the martyr, Sir Thomas More, who caught aside his long beard from the executioner's knife, because the beard, he said, "had not committed treason." But he had only one "o" in his name. The printing press, however, has come into use since then. People are prodigal of their "os," and this man who suffered death for his opinions—his repudiation of Anne Boleyn and his allegiance to the pope, was doubtless the one responsible for this modern large family of Moores who believe in the freedom of individual opinion.

American Missionary Society Notes.

The field of America responds instantaneously to the simple gospel plea. It is no difficult matter to organize churches. We could organize them from three to five times as rapidly as we do, were it not for the question of their after nurture. The work of our National Home Mission Board is not only to preach the gospel in destitute places, but to preserve the results already attained, by helping weak churches, lately organized by some good evangelist, to employ a preacher and have regular services. This work of conservation and nurture is the work that requires the money. Our National Board ought to have enough money to be enabled to do not only this work, but the advance work of initial evangelism. Our preachers and churches should see to it that a much larger offering is made for this pressing work than last year. Two hundred thousand dollars to expend in all America, including Canada and Porto Rico, is a very small amount for one million, two hundred and fifty thousand followers of Jesus the Christ. Last year $24,947.02 was expended in state work in Kentucky alone, $10,999.98 in Illinois, $12,267.26 in Missouri, $18,002.87 in Ohio, $13,525 in Texas, and a total of $142,721.37 in all states for state work. The American Christian Missionary Society does work in all but eight states, besides Canada and Porto Rico. Last year only $102,246.10 was placed in its hands, and of this sum but $56,000 was immediately available for missionary purposes. We cannot do large things upon such terms. Our missionary societies must have more liberal support. We urge all preachers to bring these facts to the attention of the churches before May 1, 1904.

We must have $200,000 this year.

The home missionaries are only our substitutes in the field, doing personally and generally at considerable sacrifice the toilsome service of the pioneer of the gospel. Heat and cold, discouragement and burden-bearing against heavy odds, do not deter them. Through patient continuance in well doing, with indomitable faith, with zeal that acknowledges no possibility of defeat, they preach the unsearchable riches of Christ as the fathers did. We ought to encourage these brave hearts with assurances of our interest, with liberal financial backing, with prayers and personal assurances of appreciation.

For home missions the brotherhood has suggested that we raise not less than $200,000 this year. This suggestion grew out of the necessities of the field in every direction. Certainly no one read the record of current events and the progress of our cause without feeling that the time for a far more urgent and wide-spread movement for evangelizing our own country is upon us as a people. But if we are to raise this splendid sum, our preachers must bestir themselves and their people. By all means let the mark be passed.

There is a deeply rooted desire widely spread and rapidly growing in the hearts of the people everywhere, that the cause of New Testament Christianity shall advance upon liberal lines, and with inescapable emphasis compel the recognition of the Apostolic Church. Churches are demanding better organization, more effective methods and tangible results. Preachers that cannot answer these requirements are losing place. The fervor for results extends to the mission fields, and the same churches are demanding to see for themselves the workers, the work and the results. All this inspires hope and confidence. The minds and hearts of the people are rapidly coming out of the nebulous and sentimental. The distinct needs of mission fields will thus be more readily and immediately felt and responded to, and the losses of prestige and opportunity, so often characteristic of the past cause of neglect, shall soon become but a painful memory. We are glad to point to these encouraging facts in view of the approaching May offering for home missions. The time has come to lift this work out of the obscurity of past years and to acknowledge its primacy.

A Mass-Meeting at Indianapolis.

On Lord's day afternoon, April the 3rd, there was a mass-meeting of the Disciples of Christ of Indianapolis at Tomlinson's Hall. This hall, which will accommodate three thousand or more, was full, and I understood that all who came could not get in. There are from five to six thousand Disciples of Christ in the city who take no sectarian name. The object of this meeting can be thus stated:

1. To deepen and intensify the interest of the churches of the city in extending the cause of Christ in Indianapolis. Many of the members of the thirteen churches of the city are already banded together in an organization known as the Christian Church Union for the extension of this work. Several of the weaker churches of the city are aided in maintaining pastors by this union. The stronger the cause of Christ can be made in Indianapolis the stronger it will become in Indiana and the nation.

2. To interest the churches of the city in Butler College. No college surpasses this in advantages of location and in advantages attending the location, such as libraries and lecture courses which a city of the size of Indianapolis affords. Butler College is located in a beautiful suburb of Indianapolis. It is a delightful residential part of the city.

At this meeting the newly elected president of Butler College, W. E. Garrison, was introduced to the churches of the city. In a few well-chosen words he referred to the nature and greatness of the work to which he is called and said that he should rely for success on the help of God and the co-operation of the churches. Brother Garrison comes to us well heralded by reputation previously won in this institution and by his achievements gained elsewhere. One said to me: "The young people are very much attached to him." It is fortunate to have at the head of a college one who can gain the hearts of the students. He will be to them a guide and a companion. Brother Garrison is called to a high and responsible place. No one realizes this more than he does. That he will do his best, which means much, is the conviction of those who extend to him their best wishes and co-operation.

Brother Philpott in his address set forth earnestly and clearly what should be the attitude of the churches toward this school. He said we ought to feel congratulated in the fact that we have this school in our midst. Butler College will be largely what we make it.

Brother Garrison can have nothing by way of help that will afford him greater joy than conscientiousness that the churches are co-operating with him in his consecrated effort to make Butler College what it ought to be.

Missions.

The church at Waitsburg, Wash., of which W. T. Adams is pastor, reached its apportionment of $100 for foreign missions, which is about three times as much as was given last year.

The church at Richards, Mo., more than met its apportionment for foreign missions.

The apportionment of the church at Point Marion, Pa., for foreign missions was $10, the offering $21.50.

Although the church at Oskaloosa, Iowa, has been without a pastor for three months, $100 will be sent for the May offering.

The church at Grand Valley, Ont., of which L. A. Chapman is pastor, has more than met its apportionment for foreign missions.

From New Orleans, La.

Having finished up my work in East Dallas, leaving a congregation of 156 organized and housed and able to pay a pastor $1,500 a year, representing four and a half months' work under the A. C. M. S., I was sent by the board to New Orleans to establish an up-town congregation and see that they were housed.

I arrived here March 1 and have been hammering away on this old city ever since and will continue for 35 days longer. I am using a tent. I felt awhile that I had met my Waterloo of failure, but the light is breaking and it is now about certain that the church will be organized in the best resident part of the city and a house provided as a certainty before I leave.

When through at New Orleans, May 1, I will hold revival meetings in small towns and good country communities all summer. I have had many calls to take all my time. I am now prepared to close up dates for the entire summer. I do not want any calls from cities of over ten thousand population till October 1.

Write me for 30 days at 1307 Valence St., New Orleans.
JOHN A. STEVENS.

Ministerial Exchange.

Clariss Yeuell preaches one Sunday a month at Shamrock and Ashley, Mo. He is open for engagements for the balance of his time. Address, Columbia, Mo.

Miss Edna Martin, singing evangelist, can be secured for revival meetings. Address, 349 McLean Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Thos. J. Easterwood is in a meeting at Sutphen, Kas., and would like to hear from other points wishing to hold revival services. Address, Sutphen, Kas.

G. E. Shanklin has located at Marshall, Mo. Churches desiring a minister for a part of the time should address him at that place.

Any church in need of an accomplished and experienced minister may be put in correspondence with same by addressing Lock Box 146, Falls City, Nebr.

MR. A. S. HITCHCOCK, East Hampton, Conn., (The Clothier), says if any sufferer from Kidney and Bladder Disease will write him he will direct them to the perfect home cure he used. He makes no charge whatever for the favor.

The Far Northwest.

In this great Northwest exists the finest opportunity for the brethren of this way to pour in their treasures of men and money if they would reap a rich harvest of souls and strong established churches after the primitive order. The effect of removal from the settled order of the East to the fluidic conditions of this western world is to give a new perspective of life, and the simple plea of the gospel finds ready hearing and acceptance from many who elsewhere had never given it consideration. With nothing like the equipment of the older religious bodies, and but one fifth the money, we are able, through the power of the truth, to save more souls and organize more churches, with the same expenditure, than any other religious body. What might we not accomplish were generous and liberal support provided our Home Board?

The times are urgent, and the Lord of the harvest pleads that we make a campaign at least as strenuous, and sacrifices at least comparable to that which is ordinary among the people fostering the gigantic humbug Mormonism. Let not our liberty in the gospel be made an occasion of boasting beyond our measure, of pride and indolence, for be assured God will require much of this body of believers to whom he has committed so much.

RALPH C. SARGENT.

Pullman, Wash.

The above is the new Christian church now being built in Carlsbad, New Mexico. So far as I can learn, our people have a building at only one other place in the territory—Roswell. The extreme dimensions are 70 x 53 feet, with a basement under all. The material is native limestone. The main floor is divided into an auditorium, Sunday-school room, primary and study. When the Sunday-school room and auditorium are thrown together, the seating capacity will be nearly 500. In the basement, provisions are made for a library and reading room, bath room, kitchen and dining room. The Church Extension Board will help us with a loan of $2,000, and our church, newly organized as it is, undertakes the work with a faith and a zeal that is bound to carry it through. They feel that nothing but the best will properly serve our cause in this valley to which so many are flocking for health and investment.

D. B. TITUS.

North Idaho.

The church at Lewiston, Idaho, gave the writer's time to the scattered Disciples at Clearwater, Idaho, for a meeting and to organize a church. I began, Feb. 19th, and closed with 28 additions and a church organization of 33 members. Nineteen were by baptism. The meeting was held in the Baptist church. Our people are influential and well-to-do; hence we have a strong young church.

Bro. J. S. Kinkaid, who makes his home in the community, will preach to them. He came to Idaho from the east in 1883. He was baptized in Buffalo, Kansas, by John Randall after he was forty years old. Bro. Kinkaid was a successful farmer, and began preaching the gospel, of necessity, he says, because there were so few to preach it in Idaho at that time. He has been preaching for about twelve years, and his work has contributed much to the foundation of our present success. He is now 71 years old, with hardly a gray hair, as sunny tempered and hopeful as a boy, a friend and father of the entire community, and he lives the most transparent life I ever saw. Bro. Kinkaid is an example of what many of our scattered Disciples might do and be. Would to God we had more such men.

Although we have been without a district evangelist this year, our district has made good progress. Bro. Skaggs has been in a meeting at Grangeville, 34 additions. Bro. John McDonald at Melrose, 145 additions. Bro. J. B. Daisley at Culde Sac, 26 additions. Bro. John McDonald at Ilo, 28 additions. Bro. M. W. Smith and Bro. McCauley at Troy, about 40 additions. Bro. McCullough with Bro. and Sister Webb to sing, at Clarkston, Wash., is still continuing, with 20-50 date. There have been several smaller meetings. Bros. M. W. Smith and F. O. Cauley will hold a meeting at Pleasant Ridge soon, and we hope one or two others in the district this spring.

Kentucky Notes.

The month of March was one of the worst in our knowledge for successful mission work. Much of our work is in the rural regions and in the mountains. The mud, rain, and bad weather generally, made a large difference in the results of our efforts. Sickness in many forms has been very prevalent, and altogether our force had a hard month's work with meager results.

The same causes, doubtless, affected our receipts for Kentucky missions. Many churches are delaying action until a more convenient season. Our receipts for the month of March are less than half our needs for the month. We urge all our friends who may see this to "lend a hand" and help our work through this most difficult period of all the year.

The success of N. H. Brooks at Pendleton, Oregon, is a source of rejoicing to his friends in Kentucky. He is one of our own boys from this community, baptized by the writer, and is entered on a career of large usefulness that we always felt awaited him.

The writer will join Walter C. Gibbs and the Ludlow Church in a meeting the first weeks of April. About ten years ago it was my privilege to be with that church in a meeting that was a great help to the congregation, adding fifty to their numbers.

J. B. Briney will run out from Louisville and preach for the Campbellsburg Church and for Campbellsville also, in all probability.

A house of worship will be dedicated at Muncifordville, Hart county, in May. W. F. Rodgers has been plugging away at this for three years. It has been a difficult undertaking. It is worth while to establish the cause in the county seats.

Those who are interested in such work are seeking to make this a banner year in our district conventions. We hope to have a good earnest meeting in every district and in many counties also such conventions will be held. The supreme need of these meetings is to have the presence and influence of the brethren in large numbers. A poorly attended convention is a wet blanket for the cause it seeks to help. Let us wake up in old Kentucky and go to these meetings as if we meant to use them for the good of Christ's cause.

Sulphur, Ky.

The Maplewood Dedication.

Maplewood is a pleasant suburb of the city of St. Louis. It is about seven miles out from the river and has both street car and railroad connections. The city is built continuous to the outer suburbs of Maplewood, but there are some 4,000 or 5,000 people who may be classed as belonging to Maplewood. We have had a mission here for some eight years near the railroad station called Ellendale. Last fall this mission was moved near the center of this population, and a lot was purchased on which a house has been erected. The dimensions of this house, from its widest extremities, are 46x54, with a splendid finished basement almost equal in size with floor above.

Surpass all other preparations in allaying Hoarseness and Irritation of the Throat. As a cough remedy they are unequalled. Avoid Imitations. John S. Brown

This house and lot cost only $5,500. The lower story is built of stone and the upper of frame. The house is complete in all its appointments, with ladies' parlors, primary class rooms, furnace, bath, kitchen, dining room and a splendid auditorium which will seat 300 people. The membership of this little congregation numbers about 100, but some of these live in other parts of the city. They had $1,800 to raise on dedication. It was found after the appeal was made that ninety persons had responded and their pledges amounted to $1,785 60. This balance was easily secured. There was never more liberal and self sacrificing giving. J. M. Hoffmann preached a most excellent sermon and made the appeal. He had preached one week and all were delighted with his sermons. He is a splendid man to secure for such work. There were two additions, a husband and wife. We thus closed up our work in the baptistry.

The South—a Field for the Home Board.

New Orleans, our greatest southern city, with now, conservatively, more than three hundred thousand souls, has received but $500 supplement this year from the Home Board. Has it paid? Let us put the cold, truthful figures on it. There has been this year a gain of 74 per cent in the membership of the congregation of Disciples, 44 per cent of which was net and substantial. The resident membership gave more than $30 cash per member for the Lord's work. Now we have not a wealthy member, and but seven members own homes. Compare this with a Kentucky, Missouri or Iowa church of a thousand members, whose financial standing far exceeds ours, and do you suppose any of them raise $30,000?

Several traveling men have said to me recently that New Orleans is far more cosmopolitan than even New York itself. Certain it is that this is a great center of mighty influence. We ought to have two ministers and a city evangelist here all the time. What I have accomplished this year, with the co-operation of these Disciples, can be duplicated again and again. And New Orleans being our hardest field, much better results can be brought forth at other points than these I have recited.

The South is old, conservative, settled. Results here will be permanent. Our cities, towns and country ought to be flooded with evangelists and ministers. This I believe the Home Board would do, if it had the means.

For these and other reasons I feel interested in the May offering and shall do what I can.

California Notes.

"The fig tree putteth forth her leaves," "The summer draweth nigh," all nature is filled with rejoicing. The season has been all that the average Californian could ask for. Every department of business is prosperous. Some of the dykes on the rivers have given way. Near Sacramento a gopher hole caused a break that overflowed thousands of acres of grain and fruit lands. It is expected that the dry land will appear in time to put in late vegetables. The miners are delighted at the heavy fall of snow. They see by faith the melting snow and see themselves beneath its streams panning out the yellow dust. But with many it is but an empty dream. I met a young man lately from the heart of the Sierras, seven years as a prospector, making enough in summer to tide him over the winter snows. Hope, the delusive phantom, leads him on.

As prosperity comes to the business interests, so the church gains strength and bares her arm for the greater aggressive work. It is a reason for great rejoicing, especially to those of us who have stood in the "firing line" these many years and have seen the great progress made in spreading the cause of primitive Christianity on the Pacific Coast from San Diego to Puget Sound. And now we need more men.

Yes, give us men all brave of mind,
Who'll face man's foe and do the right;
With "Spirit's sword" from sheath set free,
Who dare to do with strength and might.
Not men who love the cannon roar,
Not men who thirst for brother's blood,
But live to bear the "olive branch"
And seek alone their brother's good.

Our ubiquitous Brother Dargitz is kept busy "setting in order the things that are wanting," settling workmen in old and new fields. The churches generally will loan their preachers for one or two meetings, and thus an extra amount of good work will be done.

New houses are being built, evangelizing work being done and "marching on" is the cry all along the line. Some of our sectarian neighbors have pushed their walls to one side and invited our workmen to come in and preach the gospel to their people.

The four churches in San Francisco are pushing up the hills, and they have lately added a strong young staff to their forces by calling Brother Stafford, who has been holding the fort at Lodi till a successor can be called over the Rockies. Brothers Gallahorn and Carroll have done a good work at Galt, getting things in order, which has been needed for years. Several additions. Brother Gallahorn helped me a few days at Clay, resulting in 12 additions, 10 confessions and two from the Baptists. They, with all the other members, will be enrolled in the Galt Church 12 miles off, but will still have preaching at Clay. They have a good Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor. J. DURHAM.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

We are observing this week the season of prayer. May our faith and our efforts in the Master's work be renewed and invigorated by it as the grass and flowers are under the genial March shine. If not, our prayer season will have missed its object.

Christian College girls have sent their pledge of $25 to the work in Mexico. Mrs. Moore writes: "It was a pleasure to see the girls putting by their offerings for their pledge after the convention last fall." We trust this is only a beginning of special offerings which the girls of grand old Christian College shall make year by year.

Word comes from La Plata that our dear Sister Park was stricken with paralysis while preparing the auxiliary program, and died shortly afterward. How sweet to be found by the angel busy about the King's business. May He comfort the family and friends.

Every auxiliary should be thinking about its share in making the state meeting, June 17-21, a success. Send full reports. If it be possible, complete your special offering before June 1 and so report to your state secretary.

Central and Mt. Cabanne (St. Louis) auxiliaries have united, anticipating by six months the union of the two congregations. We trust this is a move to larger and better things.

St. Louis.

MRS. L. G. BANTZ.

California State Convention.

The convention at Sacramento of the Christian churches in the Sacramento district is a thing of the past, but its memory lingers still. It seemed to be the judgment of all that it was the best convention and most profitable of any in the history of the work in northern California. Nearly every church in the district was represented by delegates and some were represented by a plurality. Lawson, Holden and Stafford, of the state but not of the district, were present and added very materially to the inspiration and encouragement of all the workers.

One of the many great blessings that will grow out of the convention is the good that will result from knowing the men at the plow. All the preachers in the Sacramento district are comparatively new in the state—many of them entirely new to the corresponding secretary. Seventeen preachers have been brought into the state within the last six months.

Work here is progressing along all lines. The report of the secretary of the state work shows him to be a man pre-eminently qualified to grapple with the different phases of the work in this mighty and growing state. Bro. J. P. Dargitz has a passion for work and ability to direct it where it is most needed and where it will do the most good. I would like to give statistics just here, but space forbids. The hospitality of the Sacramento church was all that could be desired, and without doubt satisfactory to all.

The church is one of the strongest of the state, and has one of our best men as its pastor. W. F. Reagor has the praise of the entire church, and begins a meeting with his church following the convention.

The convention will go to Vacaville next year, and we anticipate even better things—if possible—as the Vacaville church has been called "manly" by Bro. Denton, its pastor.

J. B. ASKEW.

Wheatland, Cal., March 29.

A. W. Green.

The life of any prominent man always possesses interest; especially is this true when he has made an unusual success. Among this class few have accomplished more wonderful results than Adolphus Williamson Green, widely known to the business world by reason of his remarkable achievements in building up the National Biscuit Company.

Mr. Green was born in Boston, Jan. 14, 1843. He received his early education in the public schools of that city, graduating from the famous Latin School in 1859. In the same year he entered Harvard University, from which he graduated in 1863 with the Bachelor's Degree. After leaving college he was appointed principal of the High School in Groton, Mass. He remained there for one year, when he removed to the city of New York to become second assistant librarian of the Mercantile Library Association. His services were so satisfactory that in 1867 he was advanced to the position of librarian, which office he held for two years. In 1869 he entered the law office of Everts, Southmayd and Choate, and studied law with that eminent firm for four years. In 1873 he was admitted to the bar of the state of New York. In the same year he removed to Chicago, where he achieved unusual success in the practice of his profession.

The American Biscuit & Manufacturing Company was organized in 1890 and the United States Baking Company a little later. Upon Mr. Green devolved much of the work of forming these two companies. It was not long before wisdom indicated to those interested that he should become their business aswell as legal adviser. Largely owing to his efforts, the National Biscuit Company was formed in February, 1898. As a natural outcome, Mr. Green became one of the directors, a member of the executive committee, and also its general counsel. Here his business management became increasingly valuable, until at last the pressure brought upon him by his associates to give his whole attention to the National Biscuit Company and relinquish his law business was so strong that he yielded, and since that time has devoted himself exclusively to the interests of the National Biscuit Company.

Mr. Green's theory in regard to business can perhaps be effectively summed up in this statement: Give to the consumer, the dealer and the stockholder, honest, efficient service of the highest class. Notwithstanding the fact that he has a handsome home in Chicago, where with his charming family and among the books he loves so well, he may hide from business cares, he divides his time between Chicago and New York in the direction of the affairs of the company, and nobody connected with the corporation spends more time or gives more vigorous thought to its affairs than he.

BRUBAKER.

Bro. J. H. Brubaker, one of our best known and best loved members, left us for the better world in the early morn of Feb. 4, 1904. Firm faith in his rest with God enabled his loved ones to bear bravely the loss thus thrust upon them by death. "Oh death! where is thy sting? Oh grave! where is thy victory? Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

GEO. MCGEE, pastor.

Anthony, Kas., March 29, 1904.

INGOLD.

S. F. Ingold was born in Guilford County, N. C., Jan. 12, 1839. His mother died when he was but four years old, and his father when he was 13, near Richland, Iowa. He earned by work during the summer, the means that kept him in school during the winter. When 17, he attended Richland Academy and obtained a teacher's certificate. After teaching a few terms he attended N. W. Christian University, Indiana, taking an irregular course, but specializing in Mathematics. In 1864 he married Miss Minerva Curry, who bore him two children who died in infancy; the mother also died. He then came to Luray, Clarke County, Mo., where he taught; was county surveyor, owned a large farm, dealt much in fine cattle. In 1868 he married Miss Emma Ambler, by whom he had 13 children, 11 of whom are yet living. This wife died July 12, 1900. He has been a member of the Christian Church since early life, and was a faithful worker till the last, which came at 15 minutes past 3, in the morning of March 28. The writer preached the funeral to a large audience the following day. He was a quiet, and yet a great man.

"Incurable" Stomach Trouble.

Cured With Five Bottles of Drake's Palmetto Wine, Costing $3.75.

Mrs. B. W. Smith, Maloy, Iowa, says: "Three doses of Drake's Palmetto Wine, gave me the first relief from two years of constant stomach distress. Five 75 cents bottles have cured me. The best doctors and largely advertised medicines utterly failed to give me any relief. I can now eat wholesome food and have gained twenty pounds weight in three months. Our druggist sold nine bottles of Drake's Palmetto Wine one day to my friends who know what it has done for me. I am recommending it to all who suffer. The Drake Formula Company, Drake Building, Chicago, Ill., will send a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine free and pre-paid to any who suffers with stomach trouble or constipation. One small dose a day gives prompt relief and cures to stay cured."

set. For he aimed at nothing less than the subjugation of human nature itself; at least of what we must consider human nature to be, unless we view it from his own standpoint of subjection to a moral ruler of the universe and the contemplation of an eternal destiny. Indeed, if his views of God and man and their relations were false, it is evident that no power or influence, no means of which we can well conceive, were adequate to make of man what he sought him to be.

Remember, we are now discussing him from a naturalistic standpoint. We are proceeding on the theory that his religious ideas and teachings were false. If we assume that they were true, we may well believe that there was something in man's nature that responds to them, and that many things which were else impossible may be probable and reasonable. But in the man of the naturalistic hypothesis every instinct, passion and conviction would rise up in wild rebellion against such a chain as Jesus sought to impose—a dominion, a servitude, such as no despot in the height of his power ever sought to exercise over his humblest vassal. It is not merely that selfishness, and greed, and cruelty, and lust, and violence,—all our fell inheritance from the tiger and the ape,—are to be trodden down. His doctrine went further. He demands an active benevolence, an abnegation of self, a sacrifice for others, which the naturalistic theory of ethics must, however it may shrink from the logic of its position, end by pronouncing fantastic and absurd.

read the Bible from end to end two hundred times. He said: "Never let enter your minds a shadow of a doubt as to the love of the Father's heart or the power of the Father's arm." Certain Scriptures molded him. John 3: 16 was one of his little Bibles. Matt. 6: 13 was another, and John 14: 13, 14. "My grace is sufficient for thee," "See that you have, and give alms," "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them and ye shall have them," "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day and forever," "Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you," Matt. 6: 33, Heb. 13: 5, 6, Jas. 1: 2-4, Luke 6: 38, Ps. 9: 10, John 16: 23, Matt. 6: 11, were some of his life texts. He was himself a great giver. With strange frequency for sixty years, in his annual reports, an entry occurs "from a servant of Jesus Christ, who, constrained by the love of Christ, seeks to lay up treasure in heaven," and the aggregate sum given by this "servant," who is Mr. Muller himself, is $40,750—his own money, given for his own use, or left to him by legacies. When he died, March 10, 1898, his entire personal estate as sworn to was $847—books, household furniture and all belongings, $500, and $300 in money awaiting disbursement as God's steward. In addition to his orphan houses he had his day-schools and Sunday-schools, Bible work, missionaries, tract distribution, etc. During sixty years of service he raised and expended nearly $7,500,000. A man of large capital might have staggered at the thought of these operations, but this poor man cried and the Lord heard him.

He published careful reports of his work each year. He showed what money had come in and how wisely it had been invested. He made plain to the philanthropic people of every class the widespread and imperative need of such work as he was doing for the world. He step by step proved himself worthy of the confidence and support of his fellows, and trusting him with a few things, and finding him faithful, they kept entrusting to him larger and yet larger things. A mystic—yes, a great soul with some traces of superstition—perhaps; but no man can study his work and not see in it the supernatural power of God.

A MONTH

A small bottle of Scott's Emulsion costing fifty cents will last a baby a month—a few drops in its bottle each time it is fed. That's a small outlay for so large a return of health and comfort.

Babies that are given Scott's Emulsion quickly respond to its helpful action. It seems to contain just the elements of nourishment a baby needs most.

Ordinary food frequently lacks this nourishment; Scott's Emulsion always supplies it.

debt we just made on account of improvements. About a year ago we took pledges to pay off an old debt of $400. These will all be in soon and that debt paid. Lately we have made improvements which amount to about $850, and will leave us in debt $600, which we provided for yesterday. We don't expect to lose one dollar of yesterday's pledges. We think we are now in good condition for our meeting, which begins next Sunday.—LEONARD V. BARRE, pastor.

Huntington.—Cephas Shelburne reports frequent additions to the church at the regular services. Two more added last Sunday and two the Sunday previous, all by confession and baptism. Ten new members were added to the Y. P. S. C. E. last week.

IOWA.

Shenandoah, March 28.—Meetings good. Two added by baptism last night.—H. C. LITTLETON.

Panora, March 28.—A good meeting one week old with five additions to date; audiences increasing and interest deepening. J. Irving Brown is the pastor. He and his wife are doing a good work.—CHAS. G. STOUT.

Cedar Rapids, March 28.—Yesterday was a good day at the Second Church. Five more adults added at our morning service.—J. E. DINGER, pastor.

Marcus.—Have just closed a 14 days' meeting at Cleghorn, where I preach every Lord's day afternoon, with 12 additions; 10 baptisms, one by letter and one by statement, making a total of 19 additions to the congregation since November. There have been two additions at Marcus. We have a splendid class of people in both churches.—WILLIAM BAIER.

Lenox, March 28.—Work in good shape. One added yesterday. Fine audiences.—J. H. FULLER.

Centerville, March 30.—Chas. Reign Scoville, of Chicago, Ill., has just closed a three weeks' meeting here with 120 additions, most of whom by primary obedience. Brother Scoville has given the church an uplift that we will never forget. God grant to him many years in the Master's service.—C. F. B.

Ames, April 1.—Our 12 days' meeting resulted in 14 additions, 11 baptisms and three letters. The pastor, convalescing from a spell of sickness, was assisted by C. O. Hougham, of Zealring, Ia. We feel that good work of the substantial order was done, which will yet bear its fruitage.—F. D. FERRALL, pastor.

KANSAS.

Atchinson, March 25.—Our meeting is in its second week. Have had 14 additions so far. Guy B. Williamson and wife are leading the singing. I am doing the preaching.—EDW. L. ELY.

Moline, March 28.—Closed a successful meeting of fourteen days' duration at Elk Falls, Kan., March 22, with six confessions and three by statement. Four others will take membership. The church was greatly encouraged. Bro. N. Hill, who preaches for the church and is manager of the Freedman and Turner Lumber Company, is a true yoke fellow, and has great influence in Elk Falls. Wichita, April 2.—The Lawrence Avenue Church has raised my salary $100 and given me a month off for vacation, which I will spend in a meeting in Indiana. Moore was with us a few days, and I think we will be able to revive some old congregations.—J. A. MC-KENZIE.

New Haven, March 11.—The writer is now in a meeting at New Haven, where A. B. Jett is minister. Bro. Jett had everything ready. We have had five confessions first week; outlook good; our cause, however, is in a very weak condition in South Central Missouri. This, Franklin Co., is one of the largest counties in this state; it is densely populated, and we have 200 members enrolled in the county, but only four little churches and only one preacher; this is true of this entire section of the state composed of five or six counties.—JOSEPH TAYLOR.

Palmyra, March 31.—Sixteen added in a revival here with W. Henry Jones. Mrs. Jones, Kansas City, April 2.—We have had a delightful meeting at the Hyde Park Church with Evangelists Harlow and Ridenour. They dropped in on us for nineteen days between two other engagements. Although we had no time to prepare for a great ingathering, yet the meeting was much enjoyed, and we had 45 additions—27 by confession and baptism and 18 otherwise. We had to quit when the meeting was becoming most interesting.—R. H. FIFE, pastor.

NEBRASKA.

Overton, March 31.—One confession last Lord's day morning. Union temperance meeting of two churches (M. E. and Church of Christ) with W. C. T. U. in the evening, with a good program and crowded house. Will give a special program of the children this Lord's day evening, and take offering for missionary purposes.—O. L. ADAMS.

Hastings, March 29.—I have just completed three months' service for our Hastings church. During that time four have united with us by letter and six by confession and baptism. Four of the confessions represent as many families not hitherto connected with us. We can see many encouraging signs, and it is for these we look, rather than for the discouraging ones. We have added to our Bible-school both the home and cradle-roll departments, which we think are important factors in extending the influence of the church. Our seventh district convention will be held here the last week in April.—H. S. GILLIAM.

NEW YORK.

Troy, March 26.—The meeting at the River Street Church, conducted by Evangelist S. J. Corey, resulted in 10 baptisms. Brother Corey is a strong preacher as well as one of the most manly of men. He addressed meetings at the Y. M. C. A. for three Sunday afternoons while here, and his work is spoken of in highest terms by the Christian people of the city. The meeting lasted only two and a half weeks.—G. B. TOWNSEND.

OHIO.

Youngstown, March 28.—Three additions yesterday at Third Church, nine in March; four by baptism, three by statement and two by letter. Raised more than our apportionment for foreign missions. All departments prospering.—L. J. McCONNELL, pastor.

Newark.—Four confessions March 20.—H. NEWTON MILLER.

Amesville, March 28.—We have resuscitated a disbanded and defunct church in Hooper Ridge, four miles from Amesville. It will take the name of Pleasant Hill Church of Christ, Hooper Ridge, Athens Co. Last Wednesday we revived the Bible-school.—T. A. WALTERS, evangelist.

Cleveland, Cedar Avenue Church.—The work moves along steadily. Three additions last Lord's day, one by confession. Work among the young people is encouraging. Three Bible classes in the Sunday-school are growing. A young ladies' guild and a young men's club are new organizations which give much promise.—E. P. WISE.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Kingfisher, March 29.—Our meeting closed after four weeks' duration. John W. Marshall, of S. Waco, Texas, did the preaching, and Prof. Talmage Stanley, of Dallas, Texas, conducted the music. There were 61 accessions; by confession, 35; letter and statement, 12; reclaimed, two; Baptist, one; Congregational, two; M. E.'s, two; Christian Advents, five; Presbyterian, one; German Lutheran, one. The meeting was great in interest, great in attendance, great in character of work accomplished. Brother Stanley is a good chorus leader. Brother Marshall does not move so much upon the emotions as appeal to the intellect with the power of the gospel. It is our purpose now to take care of the converts. Our Sunday-school has increased 105 in the last three weeks.—ISOM ROBERTS.

Norman, March 28.—Our work is taking on new life. Large crowds are hearing us gladly. The outlook is very bright. The Ministerial Institute of Oklahoma meets with our church in May. M. M. Davis, of Dallas, Texas, has been secured as our chief lecturer.—CLAY T. RUNYON, minister.

Ripley, March 30.—Eleven additions in ten days: Ed. McKinney, chorister. Prospects excellent. Prof. E. M. Douthit, of Austin, Texas, and myself have joined hands for an evangelistic campaign. Address me at Comanche, or Brother Douthit at Austin, Texas, for work anywhere in the southwest.—ARTHUR W. JONES.

Shawnee, March 28.—Five accessions yesterday. Our work moves off slowly, but gives promise of success.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

Guthrie, March 31.—A short meeting at Quay resulted as follows: 12 baptisms, three by statement and two from another church. This church was organized last summer with 40 members. They have a neat little building and are of the right spirit to grow. Bro. J. C. Hanna, of Iowa, will preach there April 10. Orlando and Potter now have a pastor. On March 27 we visited Cushing. They will soon begin active work.—JAMES R. MCINTIRE, L. L. evangelist.

OREGON.

McMinnville, March 28.—We began yesterday with large audiences and three additions—two confessions. Good prospects ahead.—HOLMES AND GARMONG, evangelists.

TENNESSEE.

Harriman, April 2.—In this week's paper in the Cairo, Ill., report you said: "During my pastorate there I have had 25 additions to the church," whereas it ought to be 35 I took in during my work there.—LEW D. HILL.

TEXAS.

Cleburne, March 28.—Two additions yesterday by statement and one confession—a man about sixty years of age. Our work has been hindered by sickness, but is now looking up again. Our county is in the midst of a local option fight. Election to be held April 7. We are very hopeful of success.—J. G. CREASON.

WASHINGTON.

Tekoa, March 26.—We assisted W. L. McCollough in Clarkston, Wash., resulting in 23 additions to the church. We had stormy weather to contend with. This month certainly is the stormiest we have ever seen in the west. We are now assisting Evangelist J. N. McConnell, and will continue with him until June 20. Then we begin work with A. C. Vail in the evangelistic field.—GEO. A. WEBB AND WIFE, singing evangelists.

Proofs of Immortality.

By James Small.

TEXT: Now he that hath wrought us for the self same thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit."

I understand this declaration of the great apostle to be a clear affirmation that man was made for immortality, for this was the subject then before him. And if man was made for immortality, wrought for that very thing, then I conclude that man has the evidence in himself of his future everlasting being. All of God's works express his thought in their creation, and if we can read them aright, we can see and know, it seems to me, the divine purpose. One knows he was made to see, for he has eyes. He was made to hear, for he has ears. He was made to handle, for he has hands, etc.

One, of course, could show that the Scriptures assert man's immortality with convincing clearness, and Christ's resurrection is a demonstration of it, and when one lays away his dead he thinks not of science or philosophy, but of the promise of him who said, "As I live ye shall live also." The grave is not philosophy's hour, it is Christ's hour. I call your attention, however, not to the scriptural argument, but to other evidences which corroborate to us the testimony whereon the hopes of every serious and Christian man are founded.

A universal expectation makes a strong argument. This expectation has been universal. Darwin and Huxley have borne testimony at this point, as did Mr. Ingersoll in his funeral oration of John Wills: "All wish for happiness beyond this life. All hope to meet again the loved and the lost. In every heart grows the sacred flower of eternal hope. Immortality is a word that hope, through all the ages, has been whispering to live." Now, unless, as Emerson says, "man is a lie unto himself," such a universal hope is organic and constitutional, and is a sure evidence of a future life. This hope cannot come from material nature. Universal death cannot suggest life immortal. Man must have in his inmost nature the essential element to sustain such hope, or even to give such an idea. Were men all earth and all earthly, there could be nothing spiritual in him, no heavenly and eternal aspirations. Mere matter is not fitting soil on which to grow the flower of eternal hope. Corn will not grow from soil containing no element essential to corn. A spiritual hope cannot come from dead mud which contains nothing of the kind. There must be spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding.

The Christian Builds an Argument on Soul Attraction.

Desire, hope, aspiration are soul attractions, and there is no attraction to that which does not exist. The plant turns its leaves toward the light, and there is light. If the soul is attracted to the higher life, is there not such a life? When Columbus pushed his proud vessel over to these western shores he was not disappointed. This western world was the attraction to Columbus. The flower would never be attracted to the sun nor the plant to the light if there was nothing to attract them. Neptune, the planet farthest from the sun, was attracted by this principle. Uranus showed the influence of some force yet undiscovered. Adams, of England, and Leverrier, of France, with mathematical precision, pointed out the place where the planet should be, and Dr. Galle, of Berlin, turned his telescope upon that point, and Neptune stood revealed as the fruit of this great principle. If this principle of attraction discovered a new world in space, why cannot the world of spirit be revealed on the same principle? Thompson Jay Hudson, in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," reaches this conclusion from an other standpoint. He says (page 408), putting it in syllogistic form:

"1. The affectional emotions are universal attributes of every normally developed human mind.

"2. No affectional emotion can have an existence in the normally developed human mind in the absence of an object of affection capable of reciprocal feeling.

"3. Therefore, when a normally developed human being experiences the emotion of love or affection, there is necessarily existent an object of love or affection normally capable of reciprocal emotion."

Thus, the emotion of friendship presupposes the friendly relation existing between man and his fellow-man.

It follows that the emotion of religious worship presupposes the existence of an object of worship capable of reciprocal emotion. If this, he says, is not the correct interpretation of the universal sentiment of worship which is inherent in the breast of every normal human being, then there is an exception to the laws which govern every other human emotion. Why, then, should God, if he is economical of power, place hope in the human breast if this hope is never to be realized and exercised?

The Christian Builds an Argument on the Fitness of Things.

Is it unreasonable to conclude that our life, the life of the race, is no more to eternity than one season is to the cycle of seasons, or even to time as known to us? Now let us suppose our life, the life of the race, to have fallen in the winter season, that all our actual knowledge, our experience, is limited to winter, cold, bleak, desolate winter. We know of ice, snow, cold winds and dark clouds, but nothing of spring or summer. In this condition let us suppose our nature just as it is now, and that there comes a revelation of spring time and summer; cloudless skies, soft, gentle winds, the warmth of the sun; buds, flowers, fruits and harvests, and the music of a regenerated nature; would this be so contrary to us that we could not conceive of it? Would our nature rebel it as altogether unreasonable? I think not. On the other hand our nature would welcome such a revelation. We would receive it as gospel, as good tidings. It would be what we wanted, what we had been hungering and thirsting for, and we would hail it joyously, would we not? We would not say we had never seen the like, and therefore could not believe it. We could conceive of it. It would be suited to our nature, though we had never seen it. We would gladly look not at the things seen, but at the things not seen. We would be glad to know that things seen are temporary. What so welcome? What so reasonable? What so fully meets the wants, yea, the demands of our nature as this summer-land of immortality?

Would a book with a splendid introduction and nothing in the body be a fit ending? Would a river freighted with ships, with their snowy sails and with human beings, ending in fog, be a fit close? Would a beaten path ending at a high wall be a reasonable termination?

No, we travel the broad beaten track with the expectation of arriving at some appropriate place. The accumulated tributaries as they roll majestically in some main stream must empty in sea or ocean. We do not expect the great river to end in fog or be dispelled into nothingness without emptying somewhere. We can but expect that the steam of life, freighted with such precious hopes and so many fond anticipations, will empty its treasures in such a place and in such a way as not to disappoint the yearning hearts that God has made. If the river is carried into greater existence, why not man?

If the book that has a fine introduction has wealth and thought and inspiration in its pages, why will not this life be continued where there are fairer flowers and sunnier skies and holier friendships?

Reason Builds an Argument on the Education and Discipline of the Soul.

Every condition in life is educated for a higher position. But what higher position is there for man if death ends all?

What is the end of education? Go to any college to-day, hear the baccalaureate address, or even, for that matter, any commencement address, and the end of it all is character. Everything in this world is made preparation for something yet to come. The boy is educated for a later boyhood. The school is a preparation for the college. The college educational for a post-graduate course. The post-graduate course for a professional course. The professional course for a professional life. And if this life is not educational for a life beyond, it is an enigma and a worthless and meaningless thing. What can this life be a preparation for if there be no future? The universe and man were made to look up and beyond. What can man look up to if there be no work for him beyond this life? If death is the end, how can we account for the enormous waste in education and discipline and culture? Of what use is it to educate the man's affections and soul? What is the meaning of all this education if we are to be blotted out forever? How can our system of education be justified if the soul is perfected to be destroyed? Socrates and Plato, who had no revelation of a future life, based their hopes partly on this argument. On everything else man spends time, labor and affection in proportion to the possibility of its endurance. He never builds a home to be burned when it is finished. He never builds an engine to be pushed into a round house and remain there. Bridges, temples of art, machines, are built to be used, not to be destroyed. Man never seeks that which he knows will be taken from him and destroyed as soon as it is perfected.

An artist would not work a life-time on a picture if he knew it would be burned up when the last stroke of the brush was laid upon it. A sculptor would not spend a long time on a statue if he knew that when it was finished it would be immediately cast into the sea.

We devote a large part of our lives to education, we cultivate our minds, our affections are disciplined, we spend time and money and years on the education of our children. Can it be that all this culture is for something which can never be realized? Is it reasonable when a man is best fitted to live he must perish? Well does Shakespeare say in "As You Like It," "Sir, fare ye well. Hereafter in a better world than this I shall desire more love and knowledge of you."

Is it not more reasonable to suppose that we "will lay our head and close our eyes in the bright prospect of tasting those sweets for which a state of education and discipline has so well fitted us?"

With splendid bravery a Christian warrior lays down his life. Is it reasonable that his exemplary conduct shall be rewarded with annihilation?

A life-boat man goes through the surf to the sinking ship and rescues a mother and child; death comes, and he is seen no more. Shall he not live on some brighter shore?

Sir Philip Sidney lay dying upon the battle field when a common soldier asked for a drink of water to slake his thirst, and was rewarded by Sir Sidney's giving him the cup of water that would have refreshed his own poor, wounded body. If, after all our education and discipline, death is the end, can any man prove that life has its significance? Is it not, after all, a mystery? Yea, a mockery?

Truly, life is "too sad and incomplete" to answer to the highest hopes of our being. If this life is the end, then surely man is but an abortion and a reflection on God's love and power. Nay, let us say in triumphant faith and hope,

"Spring will visit the moldering urn,
Day will dawn on the night of the grave."

Family Circle

The Soul-Born Knowledge.

By Frank Honeywell.

O Death, I ponder over thee and wonder what thou art,
And why thy dreaded stroke should ever stop my beating heart,
And what thou leavest in the place of life so sweet to me—
And wouldst thou give a life of more congeniality?
Or is it death, black, endless death, throughout unending time,
A vast, abysmal, mindless deep?—Unpunishable crime!

I know that there's a life beyond, ye nonsense-teaching seers,
Who say the span of life is but these few hard struggling years.
Oh, there's a knowledge that's ne'er learnt from finite book or scroll:
It's sown with man's conception, it is planted in the soul.
It knows, in spite of how the foolish wise man reasoneth,
That life itself is reason, and that reason can't mean death.

This knowledge of a higher life that's born in you and me
Can shield these carnal temples from corruptibility;
But we must let this knowledge have some room in which to grow,
And that we have this knowledge, we will surely learn to know.
Soul evidence is given man that he may recognize
That he does know some wondrous things not seen with carnal eyes.

Why the Sermon Was Dull.

Two men were walking home from church. One said: "Well, I am glad the service is over. I thought that the dulllest sermon I ever listened to."

"I am surprised," replied the other; "I really enjoyed it very much."

"You did? Well, that beats me. But, then, you are such a stickler for the church and the preacher that anything in that line interests you."

"Oh, I do not know as to that. The fact is, I was interested in thoughts pertaining to worship this morning before I went to the church."

"Why, how was that?"

"Well, easy enough. You see, this morning at family worship, I read the fourteenth chapter of John, and, after prayer, my little eight-year-old daughter came to me and said: 'Papa, in the words of the Savior which you read, among other things, he said, 'I will pray the Father, and he will send you another Comforter.' Now, who is that, father? Is he as kind and loving a father as you are, and can we go to him with our joys and sorrows as I can come to you?'"

"Then you have family worship, do you?"

"Oh, certainly. But I was going to say, my little daughter's words set me to thinking about our Heavenly Father, and then, you know, the pastor's text was 'Our Father which art in heaven,' and the precious truths he brought out about the tender, sacred relation we sustain to him as his children were a perfect soul-feast to me all the way through."

"Oh, I see, I see; but it was altogether different with me. The fact is, we do not have family worship. Each member of my family does his and her own Bible reading and praying in secret. I believe in secret prayer.

Then, too, you know that only on Saturday our state convention closed, and I could hardly wait till the paper boy came around this morning, I was so anxious to know who were nominated. So, as soon as the paper came, I commenced to read, and I became so interested in the report of the convention that I was surprised when my wife told me to hurry up, or we would be too late for church."

"Ah, I, too, see. It is clear to me now why the sermon failed to interest you. Your mind was so full of the state convention that you had no appetite for spiritual things. No wonder the sermon was dull to you."

Moral.—One of the best possible preparations for enjoying a sermon is an hour of the morning spent in reading and meditating upon some portion of God's Word. That makes it a pleasure to go to the church for worship.

Moral 2.—The morning spent in reading the Sunday newspaper is sufficient to make the best of sermons appear dull, and to render the services of God's house uninteresting and burdensome.—Religious Telescope.

His Name Was O'Reilly.

In some country districts of Ireland it is not unusual to see owners' names simply chalked on carts and other vehicles, in order to comply with legal regulations. It is related by an exchange that a policeman accosted a countryman whose name had been wiped out unknown to him by a mischievous boy.

"Is this cart yours, my good man?"
"Av coorse it is," was the reply; "do you see anything the matter wid it?"

"I obsarve," said the pompous policeman, that yer name is o-blitherated."

"Then ye're wrong," quoth the countryman, who had never come across the long dictionary word before, "for me name 's O'Reilly, an' I don't care who knows it!"

Couldn't Quarrel—A Fable.

In the depths of a forest lived two foxes who never had a cross word with each other. One of them said one day in the politest fox language: "Let's quarrel."

"Very well," said the other, "as you please, dear friend; but how shall we set about it?"

"Oh, it cannot be difficult," said fox number one. "Two-legged people fall out; why should not we?"

So they tried all sorts of ways, but it could not be done, because each would give way.

At last number one brought two stones: "There," said he, "you say they're yours, and I'll say they're mine, and we will quarrel and fight and scratch. Now I'll begin. These stones are mine."

"Very well," answered the other gently; "you are welcome to them."

"But we shall never quarrel at this rate!" cried the other, jumping and licking his face.

"You old simpleton, don't you know that it takes two to make a quarrel any day?"

Lovest Thou Me?

A beautiful story is told in a German legend, meant, perhaps for children, but will you listen to it? The Master is in his garden. He is walking along the pathways, before the flowers in Paradise have been given their names. An angel, speaking in the Master's name, commands every flower to be still, because the Master is going to speak, and they must listen to know how they are to be hereafter distinguished. The rose listens, and the carnation listens, and the lily listens; each of them eager to ascertain its name.

And so with all the flowers. And when they are all named the Master speaks. He says, "My children, that I may be certain that you know your names, each one will tell it to me."

And the rose tells its name, and so does the lily, and the carnation, and the daisy. They all can tell their names but one, a wee little blue flower. And the Master, standing before it, hears that little flower pleading: "Oh, Master, forgive me; but I was so occupied with the tones of thy voice, I was so occupied with the beauty of thy face, that I was only thinking about thee." "Little flower," said the Master, "you have won my heart more than all the flowers in Paradise: I will give you a new name, 'Forget-me not.'"—Selected.

A Mother's Love.

A most enjoyable service last Lord's day afternoon, at the Home for the Friendless, in this city, conducted for the benefit of the fifty or more dear old ladies therein—most, if not all of them, mothers, impels these few words by your pastor, relative to a mother's love. How often are we astonished at the immeasurable charity of these uncrowned queens; their patience and goodness remind us of the Heavenly Father, whose long-suffering and goodness since the days of Noah has led multitudes to repentance. Who is it that holds no grudge and forgives seventy times seven? Who always sees the one redeeming trait in her wayward boy? Who is willing to deny many well earned pleasures and toil in obscurity that her children may have a chance in life? Who still believes in her boy, after father, brother, chum or business partner have denounced and abandoned him? Who stands the longest at the criminal's cell bars and sits by the murderer's counsel throughout the protracted and tedious trial? Who stands by the sick-bed day and night like a guardian angel, after all others have been worn out from loss of sleep, and bathes the feverish brow, turns the warm pillow and whispers words of love and encouragement into the ear? Who approaches the throne of grace most frequently in behalf of the family? Who in all the world is missed the most when called to the heavenly land? . . . . It is MOTHER. God bless her gray hairs—her crown of glory—if she still lives. God make her memory doubly precious to you, dear reader, if death has robbed your home of her sweet face and tender voice. May the chair in which she rested her poor, tired body, the pictures she admired, the Bible she so much loved to read, all remind you of her worth, and may the God of peace help you in preparing to meet her in the skies. Many of the young people of to-day have yet to learn the lesson of "respect to the aged." The tendency of this "age of wireless telegraphy" is to often neglect if not misuse these heroines of the kitchen, dining room and nursery, whose presence should be a veritable benediction and whose going away often proves calamitous to the best interests of the home circle.—B. S. Ferrall, in Upward, Buffalo, N. Y.

THE PIANO QUESTION.

A question which every household considers at some time or other is how to get the best piano possible at the lowest possible price. It is a well-known fact that the profits on pianos sold in retail stores or by piano dealers are very large, usually not less than $75 or $100, and often as much as $250.

To enable retail buyers to save this amount, a firm of piano manufacturers in New York, make a specialty of selling their pianos direct from their factory at wholesale price. They do not supply their pianos to dealers or retail stores, and do not employ salesmen or agents. Their factory and offices are at 9th Ave., Cor. 13th St., New York City, and is one of the oldest in the United States, having been established over 36 years ago. They have manufactured and sold in that time over 38,000 pianos. Their catalogue contains thousands of testimonials. They also publish a Book of Information About Pianos, which they state contains as much information as is possessed by the most experienced piano expert, and which is, therefore, of great value to anyone wishing to buy a piano. They send it free to anyone who will write them.

CHAPTER VI.

When George ate his dinner the next day, he was vaguely conscious of a changed atmosphere. Mrs. Binitier looked more uncomfortable, Flora did not come near, the dog did not sun himself in the yard. In truth, Mrs. Stoner had arrived. That night, on coming home from the store, Mr. Stoner called his delivery boy into the parlor. "My dear," he said, addressing a richly dressed lady who leaned wearily upon a divan, "this is Mr. Clayton's son I told you about."

"How do you do, young man?" said the lady, giving him a discontented look. "I am very glad to know you. Mr. Stoner, I would not have thought you could have settled in such a dead, little corpse of a town as this Burr City. What a happy name! Are there any people here?"

"Some first class ones, mamma," said Flora. "Mrs. Greer dresses as nice as they do in Kansas City, and Mrs. Mosely drives a trap."

"They will see little of me, I fancy," said the mistress of the house. "Young man"—this to George, who had been standing uneasily near the door, "I am glad to know you." Rightly considering this a dismissal, the young man went up to his room.

"Hello, George," said Spot, who stood at the table, rolling up a cigarette. "Say! I tell you what! Look a-here. I'm in trouble." There was something particularly attractive about Spot's manner when he became confidential. His handsome, refined face lit up, while his gracious voice invited George to his soul. "Say! it's something unpleasant. I hate anything unpleasant, don't you? It's a shame to know anything about troubles. I'll not bother you with mine. Besides, you're such a good old fellow, you'd be scandalized. But I'm in dead trouble, and I've got to have money, and have it quick. George, what have you got?"

"In the way of money? Mighty little, Spot."

"Have you got a five?"

"Why, yes, I have that much," returned George in surprise, "and you're welcome to it, of course. I thought it must be a matter of hundreds by your tone." He laughed. After Mrs. Stoner's cool politeness, Spot's friendliness was dear to his heart. He hastened to his trunk and took out the money. "It's about all, too, Spot. I just sent the other to father."

"I'll pay it back in a day or so," said Spot, slapping George upon the shoulder. "Good for you, old boy! Of course this is a drop in the bucket, but I am positively dry and wiped out, and a five I must have, or there'll be an explosion loud enough for all the town to hear."

"Oh, Spot!" exclaimed George uneasily, as he noticed the flush of excitement upon the other's face, "is it really something serious? Is there anything I can help you in?"

"If you weren't a—I mean, if you were one of the boys, you could help, sure, since you are my friend. But you couldn't see things as they are. To you, everything not right is wrong."

"Everyone must think that," returned George.

"I don't. There are many things that are neither right nor wrong; they are pleasures; they are just life. You must be a man and live. If a river were to stop at every step to ask which way it should flow, it would get all tangled up and never arrive. I intend to arrive."

"But it's worth thinking about—where you will arrive," George observed with a smile. "Can't I help you?"

"No—at least not yet. I may have to call you in later. And I want to say now, George, I didn't mean any harm; I wasn't thinking of doing wrong. It was just life. Now we won't speak of it again, because it's very unpleasant—the whole business. I must slip from the house when the folks are asleep, and dispose of this five-dollar bill. But don't look so scared; don't be uneasy; I won't get lost!"

The next morning as George ate his solitary breakfast, Mrs. Binitier was called from the kitchen, and soon after, Flora Stoner entered the room. "Good morning, George," she said, approaching with that air of comradeship which was also a trait of her brother, "how solemn you are! What serious thoughts you must have!"

"I was thinking about Linnie Greer's party," replied George. He caught sight of her sunny face, and a smile was reflected in her eyes.

"Oh, don't think about anything you can't help," she said sympathetically. "It isn't your fault that you must drive our delivery wagon, and it isn't her fault that she can't invite you."

"Why can't she?" retorted George.

"Because you are out of her class. You know why, very well. Don't let's talk about it. George, what made you so queer Sunday night in the summer house? I thought you were going to faint."

"I had a dream," said George gravely. "I thought my mother had come back to life somehow, or had never died—I don't know. Anyway, she stood there beside the rustic bench, I thought, and she bent down and kissed me. I woke up, and then I smelled the sweet violet perfume she always used. You smelled it, too. Coming after the dream, it made me light-headed. I never felt so before in all my life."

"I know what it was," said Flora; "you were about to faint. And no wonder! Wasn't it queer? I don't think dreams are very nice, do you?"

"That one was," said George. "Oh, Flora! if she were here, I would have somebody I could tell everything—somebody who would understand."

"But you didn't tell your mother things, did you?" inquired Flora, opening her eyes wider. "I mean secrets. Even about the rustic bench?"

George flushed and then smiled. "But I did," he declared. "And it's the greatest thing going to have a person you can trust everything to, and know they're glad when you're glad, and sorry when you're hurt."

"I am glad when you are glad," said

A MILLION FROM A MILLION LEAVES A MILLION MORE.

That is to say, a million dollars from a million disciples for Home Missions would not impoverish, but enrich. Every heart would be rich toward God. Every contributor would be confident of treasure laid up in heaven. The cause of Christ would be set forward a decade. We ought to average one dollar a member for Home Missions.

We are asking for only $200,000 this year to answer the appeals which already amount to double our spendable income of last year.

Flora. "That's why I like to hear you talk about your mother, because it makes you happy."

George smiled at the bright little creature, in her beautiful dress, with her glistening blue hair ribbon, her spotless shoes, her dainty form; then he remembered his coarse workman's garb, and recalled the fact that before others she was ashamed to greet him. Footsteps were heard approaching, and George rose from the table, his appetite dispelled. It was not Mrs. Biniter, but Mrs. Stoner who paused at the threshold.

"Why, Flora!" exclaimed her mother in a tone of displeasure. Then she added politely, "Good morning, young sir."

"Good morning," said George awkwardly. Flora blushed crimson from sudden embarrassment.

"Flora," said Mrs. Stoner, "when you are through, I should like to see you in the other part of the house, if you have time to give me a few moments."

Flora departed with her mother, and George went out to old Poll. During that week he saw Flora only at a distance, and he divined the nature of the interview that had taken place in "the other part of the house." As the days passed by, he thought he saw a slight change in Spot. His employee's son was as gay and cheery as ever, but his manner seemed forced. At times he relapsed into a thoughtful mood, while upon his face a shadow fell. At a word from George he would throw off his sober mood, and laugh and joke according to his wont. But he had not paid back the five dollars, though he had mentioned it more than once in an apologetic fashion. "I'm still in the mills, George," he said. "Never fear about your money, but I'm in an awful fix just now. It's hard on me that I can't tell you all about it, but you're so religious and that kind of thing, you couldn't understand me at all. And as for pa, I dare not ask him for money, he has preached at me so all my life about paying as I go! Say, do you know why he calls me Spot? It's a sort of perpetual moral that people jingle in my ears when they call my name. Did you ever think my name funny—Spot C. Stoner? Well, that means Spot Cash." Spot laughed ruefully and drummed upon the table. "It's pa's religion, paying spot cash is. I dare not tell him the fix I'm in. But your five will be paid back. I only wish it was a fifty!"

"I wish I could help you," said George wistfully. "There's a lot of help in me, if you would only think so."

"Is there, old fellow? Well, maybe—when I must—I'll call you into the council room."

"I do wish," said George, "since you need money, that you would economize on cigarettes and—and—champagne, Spot."

"Oh!" said Spot indifferently, "I don't want to live just to be breathing. I've got to have some life as I go along. A man's got to be a man in this world. It's all right for you to leave these things alone; you're not one of the boys. But I'm a gay fellow, you know, and I've got to live up to that character, or drop out of everything I care for. Besides, I like it. When I have a cigarette in the corner of my mouth, and my hat set back on my head, I feel that it's me."

The morning after Linnie Greer's party, Poll was taken to the blacksmith's to be shod, and George was given several packages to carry afoot to a distant part of Burr City. After he had delivered them, he took a short cut through a long, frowzy alley, and at a turning came upon an excited scene. Five or six boys of various ages stood at the distant mouth of the alley, shouting taunts at a girl not very far from George, her back toward him. She was dressed in miserable rags; her hair hung unkempt about her neck; the short skirt showed bare, soiled limbs, and her arms, bare to the knobby elbows, added to the effect of wretched untidiness. It was Marget Hootin. In each hand she held a stone, with one of which she was threatening the shouting boys. They, too, were armed, not with stones, but with soft mud-balls. A recent rain had left a pool, now black from the accumulated refuse of the alley. Splashes upon her dress and legs showed where some of their missiles had already taken effect.

"Green Witch! Green Witch!" cried the boys.

Marget threw one of the stones violently, passed the other to her right hand and stooped for another. There came a shower of mud-balls. One struck her upon the face. "You wicked boys!" she exclaimed passionately, "you wicked cowards!"

"Green Witch in the woods!" cried a boy, dodging the stone.

"Green Witch singing her charm!" taunted a second.

"Look out, delivery-wagon!" cried a third, seeing George; "you'll git a spoke broke if you don't turn to the right."

Marget turned swiftly and, discovering George, dropped the stones and buried her face in her dingy hands.

"Aw, she's er-cryin'," said one of the attacking party in disgust. "I thought she had some sperrit. Come on an' leave her be."

"She throwed at us first," said another. "I thought she liked it, or she wouldn't a-did it."

"Talk of her not having spirit!" cried George indignantly, "when it is six of you against one; and boys against a girl!"

"She throwed first!" cried the accuser.

"They began it," sobbed Marget. "They always begin it. They make me wish I was dead. They call me that to make me mad, and it does make me mad, and then I don't know what I do."

"Oh, say!" said one of the party apologetically. "We didn't know she keered. We thought she liked fightin' an' gittin' mad, she taken to it so nachur'l."

"Leave her alone," said George hotly.

"Well, who are you?" inquired the leader of the gang. "I thought the Pres'dent was in Washington."

"Say, Gawge! how's bacon?" inquired another. The sight of Marget's grief, however, had subdued them, and after staring a few moments half-remorsefully, they trooped away, muttering that they "didn't know she keered."

As George approached to pass her, Marget said, with her face still covered, "I thank you."

"Why do they call you a witch?" inquired George.

"It's to make me fight," she said in a low tone. "It's to make me awful, like you just saw me."

"I wish you wouldn't," he said earnestly.

"I never will again," Marget answered. George hurried away, afraid somebody might discover him talking to the disreputable-looking alley girl.

When he gained the main street, he saw the omnibus approaching, driven by Bill Klupertack. It was returning empty from the station. "Hop on!" shouted Bill, waving his whip. George leaped upon the end step and climbed over to the seat. This was the youth Mrs. Klupertack had invited George to visit—a burly, flat-headed, kindly-smiling Bill.

"Old Poll break her leg?" inquired the driver, seeking an explanation for the absent delivery wagon.

George explained, and then said, "Do you know Marget Hootin'?"

"The Green Witch?" said Bill jovially. He felt that George's loss of property had made them brothers. "Well, she hain't no friend of mine, ner nobody else's, I don't reckon. But I know 'er well enough. Oh, yes, I know Maggie Hootin'!"

"Then I wish you'd tell me why people call her 'Green Witch' and treat her as they do."

"That's her fault," said Bill. "People will allers treat you as bad as you'll let 'em. It's human nater to kick a dawg. Seems like dawgs was jus' made to be kicked, an' human nater was made to do the kickin'."

"But what has she ever done to make the boys treat her so?"

"Done? Why, she hain't done nothin'! That's what's the matter. That's what all her folks charges agin 'er. She won't no more lay her han' to a piece of work than ef it was a red-hot iron. She's jes' nachurly onry an' triflin', her Uncle Teeny says. Don't she live in a tent and go eroun' in rags an' dirt, tell a person wouldn't be saw with her? They're just common people, an' cheap cotton at that!"

George smiled rather bitterly, as he realized that in Burr City there were at least four sharply defined social classes: that of Linnie Greer and Flora Stoner, that to which he belonged, that adorned by Bill Klupertack, and the lowest with its Marget Hootin. "But why call her the 'Green Witch'?" he persisted.

"Well, I'll tell you. Ever go 'coon-huntin'?"

George shook his head.

"Lots of sport," said Bill with a reminiscent sigh. "We fellows go Saturday nights once in a while. We tramp miles and miles. One night I was out with the boys, an' we come onto Maggie Hootin, about five mile from town, alone in the woods. I guess she was alone; no knowin'. Anyhow, when we see her, she was. I wish you could of saw that gal! There she sat on a big log in the moonlight, a-singin'; and she was all in green. She had took and stuck leaves all over her dress, some'ow or other, tell you couldn't see a rag. Her voice was awful loud and strong an' un-human; an' she was singin' a charm. It would of made yore blood run cole to hear her. Of course nobody don't believe in ghosts or witches, but sometimes you think you do. She was a-singin' that she was a witch, an' that the moonlight was her white soul, and somethin' about frogs; it was jes' turrible! When she see our faces, she gave an awful yell, and jumped up and run so fast we couldn't of ketched her uf we had of tried; narry one of us tried. Sence then the boys calls her 'Green Witch,' 'cause they think it's fun to make her tarin' mad. She jes' goes crazy like, an' throws whatever she kin lay han' to, so it's real business, an' the boys thinks it's sport. But I tell 'em to leave the gal alone; it hain't fair, them agin one pore, no-account tent-girl. Uf she'd not pay no attention, they'd soon quit; it's her doin'. She brought on her trouble, an' now she keeps it on. She's a big gal, an' uf her dress was long an' her hair combed an' her face washed, she'd pass fur a young lady. She's ole enough to know better'n to be streakin' through the woods at mid-night, an' settin' on sycamore logs five mile from town. But nobody keers nothin' about her; she's jes' Maggie Hootin, an' never was nothin', an' never will be."

George was paid his week's wages on Saturday night, and an hour later Spot borrowed it. George felt a little uneasiness as he handed it to his friend, but there was something so fascinating in the thought of lending money to the son of rich Mr. Stoner, that he was unable to resist the experience. It made him feel lifted up in social life to have Spot his debtor. And he liked to have Spot slap him upon the back and call him a generous fellow and a man of means.

"If it wasn't for you, George, I don't know what I'd do," Spot declared. "I'd be in an awful sour pickle! But this money will tide me over, and in a short time I can pay back everything. Good old boy!"

appreciation of its worth and good work.

—One publishing house orders "Alone With God" in 500 lots for distribution under a fund for that purpose, while another orders them in nearly every mail sent to some of their patrons, such is its pure and uplifting devotional character. In cloth, 75 cents. It makes a very acceptable present.

—By pushing the bindery some we will get out all the People's New Testament with Notes this week. We thank our friends for bearing with us in the rush. For the fireside, few more acceptable commentaries on the entire New Testament have been written, B. W. Johnson being peculiarly fitted for that character of work. Two vols., cloth, $2.00, sheep, $2.75, Mor., $3.00 per volume.

—The Christian Worker's Testament is another effort toward making the word of God easy and handy for those not so familiar with its teaching and the better methods of conducting Bible readings, prayer meeting service and Endeavor work. The marking is so clear and plain that "the wayfaring man need not err." It gives the passages on some nineteen phases of "Salvation," and the book, according to binding, sells at 50 cts., 75 cts.

—The Normal Instructor, in seven parts at 15 cents each, continues in demand and will, too; for part one, "The Book," part two, "The Christ," part three, "The Church," part four, "The Land," part five, "The Institutions," part six, "The History," and part seven, "The People," are what all want and are in W. W. Dowling's concise and clear manner, which makes them so helpful.

—Stephen E. Fisher, Champaign, Ill., is making a great success of his "Bethany Reading Course," and why not? Such books relating to the Disciples as "Concerning the Disciples," B. B. Tyler; "Sketches of Our Pioneers," F. D. Power; "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," F. D. Power; ought to make the course very acceptable to those of the younger disciples wanting information along these lines, while the three books on "Bible Study" are strong and terse in their teaching of Bible doctrine, and the three books on "Missions" are needed among a people just getting light on their obligations to God and the gospel of Christ. Only 35 cents each, three for one dollar.

Current Events

At the seventy-fourth annual conference of the Mormon church, President Joseph F. Smith made a declaration against polygamy. He asserted that the church would not protect those who enter into polygamous marriages hereafter, that the consent of the church to such marriages would not be given, and that those who took the step without consent would be excommunicated. Although President Smith asserted before the Senate Committee in the Smoot case that no plural marriages have been contracted with the knowledge or consent of the Mormon officials since the manifesto of 1891, there is much evidence to the contrary. Several high officials, including Apostles Taylor, Teasdale and Cowley, are accused of having taken plural wives since the manifesto. They are at present actively engaged in dodging subpoenas from the Senate Committee. President Smith's declaration at the conference is said to have occasioned considerable consternation among the polygamists. They fear that, to clear its reputation, the church may be forced to take action against some of them.

By a decision of the United States Supreme Court, handed down last week by Judge Day, some of the shady operations of the anthracite coal trust may be brought to light. In 1902 W. R. Hearst entered complaint against several of the coal-carrying railroads of Pennsylvania—which are also, under a very thin disguise, the principal owners of the anthracite fields—before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commission's duty in such a case is to investigate. The roads did not welcome the investigation and refused to give the needed evidence. The decision of the Supreme Court confirms the order of the lower court commanding the railroads to open their books, to place in evidence certain important documents, and to give testimony bearing upon the alleged discriminations in freight rates. Since the Interstate Commerce Commission has virtually no power to do anything except investigate, it might as well go out of business if it were not granted the authority which this decision confirms, to compel testimony in cases which are subject to its inquiry. President Hadley's theory that trusts are to be controlled and their objectionable features eliminated by giving publicity to their operations, has much to commend it. The X-ray cure gives promise of being more effective and less fatal than the processes of legislative surgery. The coal trust has much to hide. The revelation of its methods is certain to be instructive, and it may ultimately bring about a lowering of the price of anthracite, which is, after all, the practical test of any anti-trust program. The decision is most timely for Mr. Hearst in view of his newly launched presidential boom.

Senator Burton, of Kansas, who was found guilty of using his official position and influence for personal profit, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of $2,500. As this is just one-fourth of the maximum penalty fixed by law for each offense, and he was declared guilty on six counts, he may congratulate himself on getting off very lightly. The fine happens to be just the amount which he received from the Rialto Company. In such a case, however, it is best not to make the punishment so heavy as to arouse sympathy for the criminal. Motions for a new trial and for arrest of judgment were overruled. An appeal will of course be taken. The grounds upon which the higher court will be asked to reverse the verdict are purely technical and do not concern the guilt or innocence of the accused. For example, certain cheques which were received by Senator Burton in payment for services in the interest of the Rialto Grain and Securities Company before the post office department, and which he cashed in Washington, were admitted as evidence. Objection is made to this on the ground that, if the receipt of money for this service was criminal, the crime was committed in Washington where the cheque was cashed, and therefore was not within the jurisdiction of the United States District Court sitting in St. Louis. There seems to be need of a clearer definition in a large class of cases similar to this. Gov. Odell, of New York, refused to grant a requisition for William Zeigler, who was charged with bribery in Missouri, on the ground that, since he had been in New York at the time when the alleged bribery occurred, he could not have committed a crime over which Missouri courts could have jurisdiction, even if he did send money to be corruptly used by his agents. More recently it was decided that a woman, resident in Iowa, could not be punished in South Dakota for sending poisoned candy to a person in the latter state. Perhaps a Supreme Court decision on the similar point raised in Senator Burton's case will throw some light on the problem. Meanwhile, Senator Burton will suffer the heaviest part of his punishment. The public condemnation, the loss of reputation, the forfeiture of the respect of honest people—these are punishments from which no technicality can relieve him.

The candidacy of William Randolph Hearst is one of the most curious political phenomena of recent years. Here is a man whose sole claim to consideration is the profession that he is the friend of the workingmen and the guardian of their interests against the aggressions of capital, yet not only is he himself a rich man, but he is pouring out money for campaign purposes and is using the check-book argument in about the same way that it has been used hitherto by the "minions of capital." Mr. Hearst's congressional record is very meagre. During the time that he has been a member of Congress he has never made a speech, has introduced only one resolution and has nearly always been absent when yeas and nays votes were called for. A hostile cartoonist characterizes three prominent Democrats by saying that Parker won't talk, Bryan won't stop talking, and Hearst can't talk. These statements are not strictly accurate, however, for Mr. Bryan has stopped talking—at least he has declared that he will speak only through his paper in future—and Mr. Hearst's money is more fluent and eloquent than ten ordinary men's vocal chords. Besides, a man who has eight daily newspapers does not have to talk. Mr. Hearst owns newspapers in New York, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles, and is about to establish organs in St. Louis, Kansas City and Indianapolis, if one may believe the statement made in a half-page paid advertisement of Mr. Hearst's plans and personality which appeared last week in many anti-Hearst papers. The power of the press has been recognized for a long while, but this is the first time any one has attempted to take the executive mansion by journalistic violence in just this way. Rhode Island and South Dakota have instructed their delegates for Hearst, but the opposition captured the Kansas delegates upon which Mr. Hearst was confidently counting. In Marion county, Indiana, where a particularly interesting phase of the Hearst campaign was expected, that gentleman came into collision with the Taggart-Parker alliance, and his vision of victory in Indiana faded. Mr. Hearst continues his anti-trust suits. He claims the credit for the triumph of municipal ownership at the local election in Chicago last week, points with pride to the Supreme Court's decision in the coal case, and is fighting the beef trust and the Chicago gas trust. The use of this sort of campaign material is Mr. Hearst's unique contribution to the history of politics.

It is beginning to be pretty apparent that the two wings of the Democratic party are not going to be able to unite in enthusiastic support of one presidential candidate. Of course it was a foregone conclusion that they would not unite on Mr. Bryan or Mr. Hearst or any man of that sort, or on Mr. Cleveland or any man who had been in open revolt against the platforms and candidates of the last two campaigns. The nomination of a candidate from either extreme would mean not a reconciliation of the two factions, but a victory of one of them over the other. There seemed to be hope that Judge Parker would be persona grata to the whole party. He has voted the straight ticket, but has never exhibited symptoms of frantic devotion to the principle of the last two Democratic platforms. But now Mr. Cleveland has unguardedly announced his approval of Judge Parker, and that seems likely to spoil the whole plan, for it has precipitated an expression of the contrary opinion from Mr. Bryan, whose followers are not at all likely to accept as their presidential candidate a man whom their leader rejects and whom their arch-enemy praises.

Congress has for the present given up the attempt to formulate and enact an eight-hour labor law. The scope of congressional action on this subject would necessarily be limited, owing to state jurisdiction, to the territories and the District of Columbia and to work done for the federal government. Within these limits Congress clearly has a constitutional right to establish such conditions of labor as may seem desirable. The labor unions have been pressing for the enactment of such a bill. The government workshops are already operated on an eight-hour basis. The new requirement is that in all work done for the government by contract, the laborers shall not be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in one day. The objection urged against this program is that contractors and sub-contractors who are engaged upon work for the government very often have in hand at the same time private contracts secured under competition, the conditions of which demand a longer working day, and that to carry on the two systems simultaneously in the same shop would cause endless friction and added expense. The advocates of the measure are doubtless moved, in part at least, by the hope that it will work exactly that way and thus compel the contractors to adopt the eight-hour law for all work. Some of the questions raised by the bill were too intricate and far-reaching to be answered off-hand even by the combined wisdom of a congressional committee and two conflicting lobbies, so they have been handed over to the new department of Commerce and Labor, which will thus have another opportunity to demonstrate its usefulness. Secretary Cortelyou has been asked to investigate and report on the following points: How much greater, under the eight-hour rule, would be the cost of articles which the government obtains by contract? Would the present contractors submit bids on these conditions? Would it involve such an increase in the general cost of manufacture as to embarrass our export trade by preventing successful competition in foreign markets? How would it affect the farmers? Do the working people want a law which will deprive them of the right to work more than eight hours a day? These are questions to be answered, and the department of Commerce and Labor is the proper instrument to conduct the inquiry. Congress can afford to wait.

There used to be a good deal said, especially in Fourth-of-July speeches and spread-eagle campaign efforts, about our country as "an asylum for the oppressed of all lands." The phrase is still heard on occasions of exuberant patriotism, and it ought to be a long time before the thought which it represents shall cease to be current. But the asylum business can be overworked. It is no part of our national duty to receive and support the delinquent, defective and dependent classes of the entire world. There are laws to prevent this, but the Commissioner General of Immigration, Frank P. Sargent, has collected evidence which leads him to believe that in the charitable and other institutions maintained at the public expense there are thousands of aliens who ought to be sent back to the countries from which they came, and can be sent back under existing laws. The law provides that any immigrant who becomes a public charge within two years after his arrival may be deported at the expense of the steamship company which brought him to the country. The investigation, to determine how many are liable to deportation under this law, has not yet been completed. When it is finished there will probably begin a period of much more vigorous application of the law, if not of the enactment of more stringent measures.

Not all the important places in public life are sinecures for graft. Some men are doing really great work for the nation on a bare subsistence. There has been some belief that any movement or position connected with the government at Washington meant "a fat job" for whoever was at its head, but some reminiscences which Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts has just published in connection with the ninth anniversary of the International Reform Bureau indicate that his position as superintendent has been by no means a wealth-producing one. This "Christian lobby" was established in 1895. Not a dollar was guaranteed toward its annual expenses. The office was a single room in a private house; the superintendent's "residence," for which he paid himself, was one back room, first in the second story, and at a later period in the third. Living expenses for room and food amounted to one dollar a day for the superintendent and his wife, and five hundred dollars covered their total expenditure for a year. The superintendent's salary was supposed to be twenty-five hundred dollars, which was just about half his income in his last two pastorates. As money came in, Dr. Crafts used every cent except what was absolutely necessary for his maintenance, in pushing the work of the bureau. It was not until its eighth year that the superintendent's salary was paid in full, when he subscribed a larger amount than all others, except one, toward the purchase of a building which would insure the permanence of the bureau. This is just enough to indicate that some men are engaged in reform work who are not looking for the spoils of office. As to what the bureau has achieved, we should have to take a considerable space were we to do justice to its work. Of course no one would say that everything it has accomplished is the result of its own initiative or its whole endeavor, but it has proven that there is a great value in having some agency right at the nation's center to watch every measure that affects the moral condition of the country. The Reform Bureau has accomplished much in the way of Sunday preservation, the restriction of the liquor traffic, gambling and other vices. We are sorry to learn that it is still crippled in its influence for lack of funds.

Our National Peril: The Remedy.

We have always been optimistic concerning the future of our country. We have been proud of its history, proud of its present prestige and influence, and of its promise of future greatness. In common with thousands of others of our countrymen, we have given the highest proof any man can give of the sincerity of his patriotism and devotion to her interests. Nor have we lost faith by any means in the stability and future greatness of our nation. It is only candid and truthful, however, to say that we have a deepening conviction, as the years go by, of the dangers which confront us and of the perils which threaten the permanency and prosperity of our institutions. We believe in the future of our country only because we believe in the renovating and regenerative power of the gospel.

What careful student of the times fails to see the marvelous growth of commercialism in this country. The material prosperity of a nation is in itself a cause for gratitude and thanksgiving; but the overshadowing influence of the commercial spirit dominating the life of the nation and the people, shaping laws and policies, and not hesitating to violate the laws of the land, and to even defy the principles of the decalogue, is a phenomenon which no thoughtful person can witness without a feeling of deepest anxiety. The inordinate desire for wealth, the greed for office and power, the fondness for display, and low moral ideals, are but the outward signs of a decaying spiritual life.

What patriot has not been aroused to a new sense of danger of late by the unscrupulous methods of political machines, stifling the voice of the people, perverting the ballot box, making political life a source of private gain, together with the plundering of the public and the debasing of official positions by those who are in office? These things are not confined to any one city or state, but seem to be widespread. It is not questioned but that honest men are in the majority, but our political methods, under the manipulations of unscrupulous politicians, deprive the people of their rightful power, and permit those who pursue politics for personal ends to control the elections and legislation.

As these evils have a common source, so they have but one remedy. The cause of these evils, to put it into one word, is materialism—not the theoretical materialism that denies the existence of God, but the practical materialism that shuts God out of our daily, practical life. The remedy is to be found in the gospel as the divine power for illuminating the mind, for quickening the conscience, for lifting up high ethical and religious ideals, and for purifying the heart and life. At no time in our history has there been greater need than at the present time of a vigorous and unceasing proclamation of the gospel throughout our own country as the regulative power which alone can put men into right relations with each other and with God, and purify our domestic, social and political life.

A great responsibility rests upon the churches of this reformation to vigorously prosecute the work of evangelization in the United States. We preach a simple, pure, rational gospel, unhampered by the traditions and commandments of men, which commands itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. It is a gospel which calls men to repentance, to pure living, to good deeds, to practical benevolence, to human brotherhood, and to mutual helpfulness. It calls upon men to enlist under the banner of Christ alone, to wear His name, to embody His Spirit, and to work with Him in carrying out His great plans for the unity of His church and the saving of the world. With such a gospel, with such an opportunity of preaching it, with so great a need for it, how great is our responsibility before God!

It is proper that these thoughts should engage our minds as we are preparing for the great annual offering from the churches and individuals for home missions on the first Lord's day in May. It is a wide and rich field which invites us to this co-operation; it is, as we have seen, a vastly needy field. The American Christian Missionary Society, which has proved itself a faithful servant and a useful channel for the distribution of our means for the accomplishment of the greatest good, calls upon us this year for not less than two hundred thousand dollars to assist in the evangelization of America. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST joins its urgent solicitation with that of the Society, that the churches respond to this plea with a unanimity and liberality which will insure the realization of this amount. Let the preachers be trumpet-tongued in urging the churches to do their whole duty, that we may save our country from the evil and corrupting influence of materialism and commercialism, and bring it under the sway of Jesus Christ, who alone can lead our nation to the fulfillment of its great destiny.

Why Trouble the Missionary Societies?

We notice that some of our journals are again calling upon one of our missionary societies to make some explanation or defense of itself, and to declare its convictions about a certain congregation which, it is alleged, has departed from the faith. We fail to see the propriety of seeking to bring our missionary societies into every controversy concerning real or alleged departures from the faith. Suppose it be true that some church which was aided by the missionary society in the beginning of its history, departs from New Testament teaching and practice. Are we to hold the missionary societies responsible for such departure? Is not the same thing possible with churches established by evangelists without the aid of the missionary society? As a matter of fact, we can point out ten churches which have departed from the teaching, spirit and practice of the New Testament, which have been planted without the aid of missionary money, to every one of such unfaithful churches established under the auspices of the missionary society. If we do not hold individuals responsible for such lack of fidelity on the part of the churches, why should we call upon the missionary society in such cases, to exonerate itself from blame or suspicion of unsoundness?

The practice in question seems to us very mischievous. Not only is it without the province of the missionary society to sit in judgment upon the soundness or unsoundness of this or that church, as all would admit, but it is highly improper and injudicious for them to enter into current controversies in respect to such churches, either in self-defense or in defense of the churches, or in denouncing such churches. The reasons for this are so obvious that we do not need to state them.

If any of our preachers or churches have wandered away from the safe path into the arid and speculative regions of rationalism, instead of preaching "the unsearchable riches of Christ," the fact is to be deplored, and it is altogether right and proper to point out to such erring brethren, in the spirit of the gospel, the error of their way. If other churches have fallen away completely from the spirit of the gospel into a narrow and loveless legalism that ties them, hand and foot, and prevents them from co-operating with their brethren, and makes them disturbers of the peace and unity of the brotherhood, that also is a deplorable fact. But in neither of these cases is it just or wise to call upon the missionary societies to exonerate themselves in public explanations from any blame for such departures? The latter kind of ministers and churches far outnumber the former, and no doubt some of them have been aided in the beginning by the missionary society, but we gladly exonerate such society from any responsibility for such departures from the faith.

We trust the officers of our missionary societies will maintain the dignity of silence under such unwise demands. They have the perfect confidence of the brotherhood as to their fidelity to the gospel and the principles of our plea. There is no need, therefore, that they be continually denying their complicity with any cases of alleged heresy, or affirming their loyalty to Christ, at the demand of every newspaper that may call upon them to do so. This is written, not in defense of either of the two kinds of heresies mentioned above, but in defense of our missionary societies. Just now attention should be concentrated upon the May offering for home missions, and all hearts and hands should be enlisted in making it the greatest offering in the history of the American Christian Missionary Society, an honored organization, managed by men who have the perfect confidence of all who are interested in our co-operative work. We beseech you, brethren of the press, cease troubling our missionary societies.

Is This According to the Mind of Christ?

Commenting upon certain utterances of Edward S. Ames, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, the Christian Standard, says:

Henceforth, we are compelled to regard him as an alien who, if he appears in these columns, will do so as an antagonist of the truth which we are to support and defend. In this classification we must place the Hyde Park Church, unless it comes to its senses, and parts company with Mr. Ames's teaching.

Disclaiming the faintest desire to dictate a general policy for the brethren, we make free to say that out of our confidence in the integrity and loyalty of a great brotherhood, we shall expect our papers, missionary societies, and secretaries and preachers and the churches generally, to assume the same general attitude toward this misguided minister and church which we have been compelled to take. To do anything else would be to surrender the gospel faith and compromise with rationalism.

These, we submit, are very remarkable statements, coming from a religious journal associated with a religious movement that decries ecclesiasticism and champions the liberty and independence of the local churches. Not only does our contemporary thus publicly withdraw fellowship from a preacher who has had no trial, and who has not been heard in self-defense, and from the local church for which he preaches, which has not yet put forth an utterance as to its attitude toward the objectionable statements of its pastor, but it "expects our papers, missionary societies and secretaries and preachers, and the churches generally," to do the same! That is, we are all expected to disfellowship the Hyde Park Church and its pastor, without waiting for any further hearing. Bro. Ames has not been tried and found guilty by his church. He has only had a newspaper trial, and that based on statements nearly two years old. Is this our boasted congregationalism? Far more important, is this in harmony with the mind and method of Jesus?

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, while holding itself second to none in its steadfast advocacy of the deity and Lordship of Jesus Christ, and in its fidelity to the great fundamental teaching of the New Testament, begs leave to disappoint the expectations of the Standard as to our regarding and treating Bro. Ames "as an alien."

We are not ready for that yet. We deprecate and disapprove some of the statements in his "confession," and regard the confession itself as uncalled for. Later we shall have something to say about his position. But we are far too conservative for any such radical action as throwing a preacher and his congregation overboard among publicans and sinners, without a fuller and fresher hearing from them, and without giving them the usual privilege of stating why sentence should not be pronounced against them. We cannot be loyal to Christ without being loyal to his spirit of patience and forbearance, and of brotherly love, even towards those in error. Brother Ames must reject Christ as Saviour and Lord, clearly and unmistakably, before we can reject him as a brother and treat him as an "alien." So we interpret the spirit of Christ, without which we are none of His.

Editor's Easy Chair.

In a recent popular book of fiction there is a very life-like description of country life in Missouri before the war. One of the scenes described is that of a meeting in a country church in which the young children were allowed to run at large during the sermon. A small urchin, being on familiar terms with the preacher, climbed on the pulpit during the sermon and improved a pause between sentences to announce to the minister that he had a sore toe,—thereby greatly disturbing the solemnity of the occasion! After all, that is not an uncommon trait in people—a disposition to exhibit their sore toes. The neighbor who takes delight in unbosoming to you all his domestic troubles, all his aches and pains, and all his misfortunes, is simply letting you know that he has a sore toe. It is a plea for your sympathy. In many cases, however, these infirmities seem to be regarded as so much personal assets or stock in trade. The victims cherish them, brood over them, and come to take a real pride in them, as a fond mother sometimes does in a deformed child. No doubt the small youth, referred to above, gained a new importance in his own estimation by reason of his sore toe; hence his desire to exhibit it. So with grown up people.

About the worst form, however, in which this disposition manifests itself, is when the preacher feels it to be his duty to exhibit to the public his intellectual difficulties and unbeliefs. As a matter of fact, there is a wide range of practical and important truths which he believes, and which, if earnestly preached, would prove helpful to the people; but he has a weak point in his faith somewhere, and he has an abnormal desire to exhibit that weakness. Instead of preaching the truth he does believe, he is fond of reciting those things, commonly held by others, which he does not believe. No doubt he often persuades himself that this is frankness and candor. He does not wish to appear to believe more than he actually does believe. Perhaps there is something of that worthy feeling in it. But oftener than otherwise, such preachers have come to regard these peculiarities in their belief or unbelief as part of their intellectual and spiritual assets, and they take real pleasure in exhibiting them to the public in spite of their negative character and their lack of stimulating power. Many years ago we advised a minister who came to us with his difficulties, to preach what he believed to be true and let his doubts and unbeliefs alone, as the people had enough of these of their own. He promised to do so, but the temptation was too strong and he soon resumed the habit of preaching his negations—exhibiting his sore toe—until he made shipwreck of his ministry. The few things he did not believe were allowed to eclipse all the glorious truths he did believe!

But there is another phase of this disposition to exhibit infirmities that is no less reprehensible. We refer now to the person who has a morbid fondness for pointing out other people's sores and infirmities. Having no faults of their own, in their own estimation, their tendency to exhibit faults takes an altruistic turn, and they point out the faults of their neighbors or their brethren! Who of us has not met such persons? Sometimes we have learned more about the foibles and faults and short-comings of preachers in an hour's conversation with a preacher of this type, than we have ever known or heard before. This disposition works the most disastrous results when it takes possession of editors. There are religious journals whose stock in trade consists largely in uncovering to the gaze of the public the faults of their brethren. They generally manage to keep at least one case of heresy on hand, in order to create a demand for their journals on the part of those who regard them as defenders of the faith, and the only reliable breakwater against the inundating tide of skepticism! Of course, preachers with a fondness for exhibiting their sore toes, play right into the hands of the editor who likes to give a wider publicity to these sores of the body ecclesiastic than the preacher can give them. These phenomena indicate pathological conditions that are worthy of study.

Over against these weaknesses of our poor human nature, let us place the lofty and inspiring example of Jesus, our divine Lord. Never man penetrated so deeply as He into the secret motives of men's lives. Never teacher saw with such clear vision all the weaknesses and frailties of men.

And yet, never did reformer or philanthropist see so much in human beings to admire and to love as He. Down beneath the outer crust of faults and imperfections His eye beheld the divine image and its marvelous possibility of development. How patient and tender He was with His disciples! He did not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax. The weakest faith He recognized and sought to develop. Doubting Thomas was not repelled by harsh denunciations, but won to an ardent faith by His loving condescension to his needs. Unfaithful Peter, who denied him thrice, was won back to apostleship and martyrdom for his Master by the Master's love and forbearance. Zaccheus, despised and hated for his extortion, was honored with the Master's presence at dinner, and won by gentleness and love to a life of honesty and purity. Oh, for the Master's gentle touch and His forbearing love, such as He manifests toward us, in dealing with our fellow men!

Questions and Answers.

Q. What is the meaning of "novice" in 1st Timothy 3:6?
Havelock, Neb. EDGAR MCMASTERS.

A. It means a new convert, one inexperienced in Christian life and service.

Q. Explain the following passages: 1. "For they have gone in the way of Cain." Jude 11. 2. "Let neither man or beast, herd or flock taste anything, but let man and beast be covered with sackcloth and cry mightily unto God." Jonah 3:7, 8.
Carmi, Ill. F. B. THOMAS.

A. 1. To go in the way of Cain is to follow Cain's example of disobedience and murder.

2. The quotation is from the proclamation of the King of Nineveh, proclaiming a fast and clothing in sackcloth as outward tokens of repentance to avoid the doom which Jonah had pronounced against the city. Even the beasts were to share in these outward signs of penitence, though of course they were not expected to "cry mightily unto God." That was enjoined upon those who had the knowledge of God.

Q. I have been asked what was the gift of the Holy Ghost, and I am not able to fully explain it. Will you please do so?
Republic, Mo. MRS. H. A. MASSEY.

A. When Jesus was about to leave the world He promised His disciples that He would send them "another Comforter," the Holy Spirit, who was to represent Christ and who was to abide with His disciples forever. The gift of the Holy Spirit is the realization of this promise, and it signifies the reception of the Holy Spirit by the believer, that He may carry forward in such believer the work of confirmation and sanctification until he has been transformed into the likeness of Christ. It is the privilege of all believers today to enjoy the gift of the Holy Spirit, without whose gracious aid we cannot be equipped for service or perfected in Christian character.

Q. What is the sin against the Holy Spirit?
Summerfield, Kas. C. G. SHEPARD.

A. It is the rejection of Christ in the light of all the evidence which the Holy Spirit furnishes concerning Him. It is resisting the light and the truth, and being false to one's own convictions of duty. It is the deliberate and ultimate turning of the soul away from the light, and from Christ, who is the light, and the choosing of darkness instead. Therefore, it hath no forgiveness, neither in this world nor in the world to come. The Holy Spirit stands as the Vindicator and Champion of Christ, furnishing the highest and final proofs of his divine character and mission, and to turn away from Him in the light of all this evidence is what we understand to be the sin against the Holy Spirit, and it is as possible to-day as it was in the days of Jesus.

Q. Why does Jesus call Peter "Satan" in Matt. 16:23?

A SISTER.

A. Because Peter presented the same temptation to him to win his kingdom by worldly methods, that Satan had presented. To that extent he was like Satan. On the same principle many who are given to accusing their brethren, unjustly and extremely, might be called Satan, who is designated as an "accuser of the brethren." It is well for everyone to watch his actions and motives closely lest he be found, unconsciously, in partnership with Satan.

Notes and Comments.

There are some people whose sanctification is probably "in spots." A holiness paper has announced that it is about to adopt a cash-in-advance plan, because many of its subscribers will not pay their dues. Heaven is not so very near that man, whether he be "sanctified" or an "immersed Christian," who boasts of his right beliefs and forgets his wrong acts.

Clarence Darrow hits the same weak spot that Lincoln Steffens lays bare in his article from which we quote on another page. Mr. Darrow, who is a strong advocate of the labor unions and represented the coal miners in the famous arbitration case, says, in view of the Northern Mergers decision, that "if combinations of capital are monopolies, so are combinations of labor." But he thinks the decision will have little effect. Why? Because Americans are easy-going folk.

The union spirit is contagious. Various Methodist bodies and various Presbyterian bodies of Canada having effected a union, a movement is now on foot to bring about an organic union between the Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists of Canada.

There has been a meeting recently of representatives of these different bodies to consider that question, and the religious press of the different bodies seems very favorable to the movement. The Presbyterian Witness of Halifax, favoring the union, says: "But what about our respective histories? And what about our different views of systematic theology? What of Arminianism and Calvinism? These questions and all supposed difficulties are capable of solution and settlement if we are only true to the grand center of unity—to the Lord Jesus. He is the rock on whom we build. Both united to him cannot be far from one another." This is a very clear glimpse into the secret of Christian union, and if the principle here suggested is pursued, there is no doubt but that it will lead to the desired consummation in Canada. How would it do to apply it under the Stars and Stripes?

There has always been a certain amount of rivalry, with its accompanying jealousy, between Chicago and St. Louis. But the fact that Chicago has its car-barn murderers and its strike feuds and a good share of unworthy aldermen does not in the least detract from the justice of the following very interesting criticism in the Interior which is the point of view of the best citizenship in the whole country:

Some tranquil localities of the United States are now historically celebrated as the scenes of the most greswome outbreaks of the savagery of the old-time American Indian. We have no doubt that in the better America of the future some such sort of interest will attach to St. Louis as the spot where the political "Indian" ravaged most and worst the face of American free institutions. But we hope it will not take by any means so long to embalm in history this political savage as it took to dispose of his ethnological prototype. Especially and profoundly we hope that, wherever he may range, our future history will not have to tell of his ever doing anything worse than at the Democratic primaries in St. Louis. We do not think the decent electorate of any other city has up until now ever suffered such outrageous treatment from thugs and bums as befell those men of St. Louis who tried to vote for a respectable candidate. The atrocity of it all would be as discouraging for our institutions as it is appalling to patriotism, if it were not for the one circumstance that the toughs treated the well-behaved men outrageously enough to make them boiling angry. There is always hope when the respectable people get thoroughly mad. And the courage of the grand jury of Democrats who officially placed the blame of the shame on a Democratic governor, means that the right people in this case are effectually enraged. By such tokens we are encouraged to believe that St. Louis will never again have to endure a day so humiliating, and we trust the city will soon have such an "Indian"-killing that not one of the tribe may escape to plague other towns.

We are never the worse—if we can control our temper—for seeing ourselves as others see us. And just now and until a reform has been accomplished we hope the "respectable people" will get and keep "thoroughly mad," not at outside critics, but at the conditions that give cause for criticism.

The Coming of Christ

By Cephas Shelburne

Christ has come, he came again, he will come. Christ is continually and perpetually coming. The first coming of Christ was personally, visibly, in the divine birth in Bethlehem, in the flesh. He went about all Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom—the great prophet and teacher; he healed all manner of diseases and sicknesses among the people—the great miracle worker; he was, in sermon and parable, laying down the laws and principles of the kingdom, teaching his disciples, commissioning his apostles—preparing for the new covenant and order of things.

The second coming of Christ was at Pentecost, ten days after his ascension from Olivet in the person of the comforter, the Holy Spirit, the helper, to abide in his stead and to supply his place in his absence; comforting his disciples, enduing them with power for service, guiding them into all truth and righteousness, bringing all things that he had said to their remembrance. He was not to speak of himself or reveal or glorify himself, but to speak the things of Christ, and reveal and glorify Christ. The apostles and ministers of Christ were and are to preach the truth; the Holy Spirit is to bring the truth home in convicting power to the hearts of the hearers, bringing inquirers to the point of surrender, and dwelling as a gift in the hearts and lives of those who have accepted Christ by repentance and obedience—the true vicar and vicegerent of Christ in the earth.

The third coming of Christ was in the destruction of Jerusalem and the desolation of the house on Mount Moriah, when in obedience to prophecy not one stone was left standing upon another. That was a coming of Christ to end the old Jewish state and theocracy, and out of the midst of those horrors, burnings, and downfall came a new and better day, the spread of the gospel, the spiritual conquest of the church; and Christianity was no longer confined to its local habitation or to a Jewish sect, but became the religion of the world. Paul expresses by saying: "The fall of them became the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, and the casting away of them the reconciling of the world."

The fourth coming of Christ is visibly, in the clouds, when every eye shall see him—coming with power and great glory; coming to claim his own, to receive the church unto himself to be where he is; coming as King of kings and Lord of lords; coming to complete the universal, spiritual reign of the kingdom of heaven on earth. The words paraclete and parousia, which refer to the coming of Christ, are separate and distinct terms. The word "parousia" has reference to his second visible coming, and is yet in the future, and no man or angel knoweth the day or the hour. The "paraclete" has reference to his coming in the person of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, A.D. 33. In the one presence he came invisibly and spiritually; in the other he comes bodily and gloriously. In the one case he comes to dwell with the church; in the other he comes to take the church to dwell with him. He went away to send the Paraclete to his people; he returns again in the Parousia that his people may come to him. Christ while on earth prayed for the Paraclete to come; the Paraclete and the church, "the Spirit and the bride," now pray for the hastening of the Parousia.

There is another coming of Christ, the true and real coming, with which we should most concern ourselves, and that is the continual, spiritual coming of Christ into our hearts and lives and homes; into our business and the state and social order. The first coming of Christ was in the flesh, a flesh and blood Christ; the coming now is the real, in the new birth and creation, the kingdom within, "Christ in you the hope of glory."

"Christ came the first time into men's vision by coming on the plane of their senses; he comes to-day into men's vision by lifting them up to his plane of spiritual comprehension." Christ said to doubting Thomas: You believe because you have seen and felt; "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Seeking after signs, handling the personal Christ, hearing him speak—and men were yet millions of miles from the real Christ, "a wicked and adulterous generation." And were he to come tomorrow, in the cloud-chariot, surrounded by visible angels, amid the voices of archangels and blowing of trumpets, we which are alive and remain might fare no better. That would be no real coming of the Christ to the man unprepared to receive him, who had not previously Christ formed in him, and the principles of the kingdom of God as the rule of his life.

We shall be no nearer the Christ than now, and he no nearer us. According to the bent and character of our lives, we shall hear the "depart," or the "come ye blessed." The kingdom is already prepared for those who have the kingdom of heaven within. When the Pharisees demanded to know when the kingdom of God should come, he answered them: "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. Neither shall they say, lo here! or, lo there! for behold, the kingdom of God is within you." To the disciples, when they wanted to know when the kingdom of heaven should be set up, and who should be the greatest in it, he said: The kingdom of God is receiving and becoming.
